INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BECK. Yesterday the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE,] not now in his seat, reported from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various tribes for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, an agreement between the two Houses as to all the amendments, except amendments numbered 30 and 31, upon which they were unable to agree. I move now that the Senate further insist on its amendments numbered 30 and 31, and ask for a further conference in regard to those items.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. To which the Chair hears no objection. That order will be entered.

Mr. BECK. Let the Chair appoint the conferees. ["No objection."]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will appoint the same as at the former conference, namely, the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE,] and the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BAYARD. If there is no other morning business I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asks the Senate to proceed at this time to the consideration of the funding bill, to which the Chair hears no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT COLUMBUS.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senate to be gracious to me this morning, as it is probably the last request I shall ever make of it, and I make it with the leave of the Senator from Delaware. I ask unanimous consent that the funding bill be laid aside temporarily subject to call, in order that I may ask the Senate to take up a bill to authorize the construction of a fire-proof building at Columbus, Ohio, for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, internal-revenue offices, and the pension office.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2178) to authorize the construction of a fire-proof building at Columbus, Ohio.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 7, after the word "offices," to strike out "at a cost not exceeding $800,000," and insert:

With fire-proof vaults extending to each story, the site, and the building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the cost of $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill the following additional proviso:

And provided also, That there shall be an open space of fifty feet upon every side of said building, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM H. GILL.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to have the consent of the Senate to call up the bill (S. No. 1710) for the relief of William H. Gill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair reminds the Senator from Illinois that the Senator from Delaware holds the floor.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that the bill will not lead to discussion.

Mr. LOGAN. It will take but a moment. There is a short report.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the President to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint William H. Gill a military storekeeper in the Quartermaster's Department, with the same grade and rank he would have held had he remained continuously in service. But he shall receive no pay or allowances whatever for the time he shall have been out of service, nor shall he be required to refund the pay or allowances received by him at the time he was mustered out of the service.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report?

Mr. LOGAN. There is. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MAXEY May 4, 1880:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of William H. Gill, respectfully submit the following report:

Captain Gill entered the service of the United States, as military storekeeper in the Quartermaster's Department, June 12, 1858, and served continuously until December 23, 1870.

During the war of the rebellion he had charge of and was responsible for clothing, and camp and garrison equipage, exceeding in value $50,000,000, and performed his duties with such efficiency and fidelity as to receive the highest commendation from his superior officers.

Having been ordered from Schuykill Arsenal, Philadelphia, to Fort Union, New Mexico, in 1870, he completed his inventories and obtained his receipts for property turned over on the 5th of December of that year.

Meantime he had applied to the Adjutant-General of the Army for a modification of a month's leave of absence granted to him, commencing November 1, 1870, so that it would commence as soon as his inventories should be completed; otherwise he could not avail himself of the leave. This application was refused.

About this time his daughter was taken suddenly and seriously ill, and he was compelled to remain at her bedside; and therefore, on the 7th day of December, two days after his receipts were obtained, he tendered his resignation in order to avoid the necessity of leaving her. But before he received notice of the acceptance of his resignation he asked to withdraw it by telegram, on the recovery of his daughter, on the 19th of December, 1870. On the 24th of December, 1870, he received a letter from the Adjutant-General of the Army, dated December 22, notifying him that his resignation had been accepted to take effect December 16. At the time it was accepted the request to withdraw the same was in the hands of the Adjutant-General.

Captain Gill's faithful and honorable service entitled him to a leave of absence before his departure for New Mexico, and it was a great hardship to be compelled to tender his resignation in order to attend his daughter in her sickness; and it was unjust, if not considered unlawful, to accept his resignation after he had withdrawn it. He promptly but unsuccessfully petitioned the President to revoke the order accepting his resignation. These facts are fully evidenced by the papers hereto attached.

Your committee respectfully submit the accompanying bill with the recommendation that it be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. There are two bills on the Calendar authorizing the change of name of some steamboats, commencing at order of business No. 982. I should like very much if those bills could be taken up and passed. They are Senate bills, and I am very desirous to have them disposed of.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. MCMILLAN. It will take but a very short time to pass the bills referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. It will only take the time required to read the bills, and they are very short indeed.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that the funding bill is now before the Senate, and that it was laid aside temporarily upon the application of the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] who desired for reasons which he stated the present consideration of an uncontested measure. Then followed a similar application from the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.] The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] has appealed to me and my friend from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] has asked that I should give him an opportunity to call up a bill. So far as I am concerned, I am disposed to yield to the convenience and desires of the various Senators; but this is a matter of public business and in view of the importance of the pending measure, and the fact that debate upon it must be restricted, as by unanimous consent the bill is to be voted upon at two o'clock with its amendments, I submit to Senators that we ought not to encroach upon the two short hours that are to elapse before the vote is to be taken on the bill. I call for the consideration of the funding bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate accepting the statue of Jacob Collamer, presented by the State of Vermont for the National Statuary Hall, and extending the thanks of Congress to the governor and, through him, to the people of Vermont for the same.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 162) to grant the use of artillery, tents, &c., to be used at the soldiers' reunion to be held in Maine in 1881.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1381) to authorize the construction of a free bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in some and non-concurred in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 7103) to constitute Atlanta, Georgia, a port of delivery; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

IMPROVEMENT OF LUBEC CHANNEL, MAINE.

Mr. HAMLIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the appropriation for the improvement of Lubec Channel, Maine, to the amount recommended by the Engineer Department.

THE FUNDING BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. Is any precise order affecting the question desired?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for a separate vote on each amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole will be reported in their order.

Mr. BLAIR. As I gave notice last night, I desire to move an additional amendment, and it must be moved, I suppose, now as in the Senate. I am not sufficiently instructed in the rules——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unless it be an amendment to an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, it is not now in order. After the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole shall have been disposed of, the bill will be open to amendment. The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole will be reported in their order.

Mr. BLAIR. I move in the fifth section to amend the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be reported in their order, and when that section shall be reached, the amendment will be received.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 15, after the word "bonds," to strike out "in the" and insert "to an;" and after the word "amount" to strike out "of;" so as to read:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds to an amount not exceeding $400,000,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 16, after the word "dollars," to insert "of denominations of $50 or some multiple of that sum."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 18, after the words "per annum," to insert "payable semi-annually."

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that the amendment increasing the rate of interest from 3 to 3½ per cent. can be moved hereafter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It can. An amendment to an amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be in order when the amendment is reached, or amendments generally will be received after the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole shall have been acted upon.

Mr. BAYARD. I reserved a vote separately on the amendment of the committee which I indicated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has called for a separate vote on all the amendments, and the Chair is taking them in the order in which they were made. The question is on concurring in the amendment just reported.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 20, before the word "years," to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to read "and payable twenty years from the date of issue."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in line 21, section 1, after the word "also," to strike out "certificates in the" and insert "Treasury notes to an;" and in line 22, after the word "amount," to strike out "of" and insert "not exceeding;" so as to read "and also Treasury notes to an amount not exceeding $300,000,000."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 23, before the word "dollars," to strike out the words "twenty and fifty," and after the word "dollars" to insert "or some multiple of that sum not exceeding $1,000;" so as to read "not exceeding $300,000,000 in denominations of $10 or some multiple of that sum not exceeding $1,000."

Mr. THURMAN. I should be glad if the Senate would refuse to concur in the amendment striking out "twenty and fifty," although I do not know that there is any hope of their doing so. My opinion is that none of these Treasury notes should be of as low a denomination as $10. They will make circulation for two or three years if they are, and produce some inflation that will not be very agreeable. It may suit some persons, but others it will not. I do not think myself that the denominations ought to be under $50, and if the amendment should be non-concurred in I shall move to strike out the words "ten, twenty, and;" so as to read "in denominations of $50 dollars or some multiple of that sum."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio move to amend the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not make any motion to amend now, because the question is on concurring in the amendment striking out "twenty and fifty" and inserting. I hope the amendment will not be concurred in; and if it should not be concurred in, I shall offer the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. BAYARD. The words "or some multiple of that sum not exceeding $1,000" cover the objection of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. THURMAN. The term "multiple" does not cover it, because the Secretary of the Treasury may issue as many notes of the denomination of $10 as he sees fit; and with our experience of the circulation of the 7.30 notes and of the compound-interest notes, I think it is an unsafe thing to issue these notes of as low a denomination as $10. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio is entitled to great consideration; and that is not on the precise point of the $20 and the $50 notes, but on what is involved in allowing notes of the denomination of $10. I had not thought of it before, because from ill health I have not given much attention to this bill; but it will certainly have the effect, if you issue $10 notes to be subscribed for, (in case the loan be taken at all at 3 per cent., which it seems a majority of the Senate think is the right rate,) of enormously increasing temporarily, for a year or two, perhaps, the amount of what is practically currency in the country. Whether, in the present condition of business and the present plenty of money, that is a wise thing for the law-making power to provide for and authorize, is certainly a very serious question; for whatever we may think about greenbacks and paper money everybody's experience has demonstrated from the beginning of money down to this day that a sudden inflation is always followed with moral certainty by a sudden hardness, as I believe the money men call it, usually followed by a panic and distress and failures. Therefore it strikes me that the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio is very wise to put this loan, as far as we can, in such a way as not to pour into the circulation of the country this enormous addition because experience has shown that it is certain to be followed by enormous evils.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the Senator from Vermont answer this question: whether the latter part of that section does not cover the case he alludes to? I refer to the provision in line 29:

And no Treasury note of a less denomination than $100 shall be registered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am obliged to the Senator for the suggestion. It adds strength to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio. These are coupon securities, not being registered; cannot be registered, and therefore they may be the more readily poured into the circulation of the country and more readily invite people and tempt everybody into enterprises that in the end always—because that is the universal experience—lead to disaster and failure and trouble.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I asked for information, because I agree with the Senator, that if the amendment to which I called attention refers only to the registration of the notes, then we should adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio. I do not think the denomination of these notes ought to be as low as $10.

Mr. BAYARD. There has been a clamor for some features to popularize this loan, to distribute it in small sums among the poorer classes of the people of this country; and when both Houses have concurred in such a feature—the measure came to us from the House of Representatives and the Senate concurred in that feature—now objection is made to it. The Senate will observe that so far from having the expectation of great numbers of these $10 certificates being taken we were obliged to prevent their solidification by limiting the multiple to $1,000. The object of that was to prevent them from being taken in one mass to the exclusion of the smaller subscribers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is another clause in the bill that saves the smaller subscribers.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not think that it will popularize this loan much to issue $10 Treasury notes. I do not think myself that they will be sought for as investments by the poor people—a ten-dollar bill the interest on which is to be thirty cents a year, and which is liable to be paid at any time the Government sees fit to pay it. I do not think there is much in that. The whole effect of it will be that these notes will simply pass as currency.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment which has been reported.

The amendment was concurred in; there being on a division—ayes 36, noes 11.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 25, after the word "at," to strike out "the" and insert "a," and in line 26, after the word "rate," to strike out "of" and insert "not exceeding;" so as to read "bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent. per annum."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in line 26 of section 1, after the word "annum," to insert "payable semi-annually."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in line 29 of section 1, after the word "issue," to insert "and no Treasury note of a less denomination than $100 shall be registered."

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether there ought not to be some provision requiring these notes to be issued in series, so that they will not fall due at one time? If they should all, or a very large proportion of them, be issued at one time, it seems to me there would be fluctuation in the amount of currency, for the reason that when they are first issued and before any interest accumulates upon them they will pass freely as a circulating medium, but the moment the interest begins to accumulate they will be hoarded, and then when the interest is paid and they are worth nothing for the accumulated interest they will pass again into circulation; so there will be a constantly fluctuating medium. Ought there not to be some provision to prevent that?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think that will be affected at all by the limitation as to the registration of the notes.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not think so either, but I thought this the best point to make this suggestion as to the necessity of another amendment. I do not think this amendment applies to the matter.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator can offer an amendment afterward.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no amendment prepared, but I wanted to suggest the idea to the chairman.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 31, after the word "and," to strike out "certificates" and insert "Treasury notes."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 1, line 40, before the word "notice," to insert "publication of."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to add to section 1:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to authorize public subscriptions, at not less than par, to be received at all depositories of the United States, and at all national banks, and such other banks as he may designate, for the bonds and for the Treasury notes herein provided for, for thirty days before he shall contract for or award any portion of said bonds or Treasury notes to any syndicate of individuals or bankers, or otherwise than under such public subscriptions; and if it shall happen that more than the entire amount of said bonds and Treasury notes, or of either of them, has been subscribed within said thirty days, he shall award the full amount subscribed to all persons who shall have made bona-fide subscriptions for the sum of $2,000 or less, at rates most advantageous to the United States, and the residue ratably among the subscribers in proportion to the amount by them respectively subscribed, at rates most advantageous to the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. After the word "less" in line 55 I think the comma should come out. The "rates most advantageous to the United States" apply to the bona fides of the subscriptions to the amount of $2,000. That ought to be one clause so to speak. I do not know that it would vary the legal construction, but I think the comma after "less" should not be there.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The change will be made according to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont. The question is on the amendment as thus modified.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 2, line 3, after the words "bonds or," to strike out "certificates" and insert "Treasury notes."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 2, line 11, before the word "issued," to strike out "certificates" and insert "Treasury notes."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 2, after the word "issued" in line 11, to strike out "but none of the provisions of this act shall apply to the redemption or exchange of any of the bonds issued to the Pacific Railway Companies."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, at the end of section 2, to insert "but none of the provisions of this act shall apply to the redemption or exchange of any of the bonds issued to the Pacific Railway Companies."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to ask the chairman of the committee why this provision is inserted. Inasmuch as I believe these bonds of the United States—for they are bonds—bear 6 per cent. interest, it would seem if they are redeemable within these times that it might be desirable, as we have to pay them, and have to pay the interest, and do not get the whole amount of the interest back again as yet, to turn them into a lower interest-bearing security; but there may be some difficulty about it that has not occurred to me.

Mr. BAYARD. There was the consideration of the special contract existing under which these bonds were issued. They are thirty-year bonds, and there is no option attached to them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the amendment would have been unnecessary except out of abundant caution.

Mr. BAYARD. That is the reason for it.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, at the beginning of section 3, to strike out "authority to issue bonds and certificates to the amount necessary to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby granted; and."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 3, line 5, after the word "effect," to strike out "provided that" and insert "and."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 3, line 7, before the word "authorized," to strike out "certificates" and insert "Treasury notes."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 3, line 8, after the word "exceed," to strike out "one-quarter" and insert "one-half;" so as to read:

And the expense of preparing, issuing, advertising, and disposing of the bonds and Treasury notes authorized to be issued shall not exceed one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. BECK. Would it be in order to move to make that one-third at some time?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Such a motion is in order at this time.

Mr. BECK. I make that motion now to strike out "one-half" and insert "one-third."

Mr. BAYARD. Without renewing the argument of last night, I trust that motion will not prevail. The matter was stated to the Senate; the reason in full was given; and I think the vote taken was emphatic enough to establish that it is proper and right that we should not restrict this amount to one-third of 1 per cent., but that it should be left not to exceed one-half of 1 per cent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, to strike out "one-half" and insert "one-third."

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDMUNDS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 26, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Beck,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Vance,
Booth,	Harris,	Maxey,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Walker,

Brown,	Edmunds,	Plumb,	Whyte,
Bruce,	Grover,	Ransom,	Withers.
Carpenter,	Jones of Florida,	Sharon,
Conkling,	Jones of Nevada,	Thurman,

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was stated to be: after the word "use," in line 2 of section 4, to insert "temporarily;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if in his opinion it shall become necessary, to use temporarily not exceeding $50,000,000 of the standard gold and silver coin in the Treasury in the redemption of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds of the United States authorized to be refunded by the provisions of this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to that because it makes the section better than it was before; but I want to put in an humble but earnest objection to any part of the coin that we now have in the Treasury which stands as the redemption fund for more than $300,000,000 of legal-tender notes being touched at all; and the effect of this whole provision is—it is improved of course largely by putting in "temporarily"—to take out of the Treasury $50,000,000 of coin and leave it out all the time, being reimbursed if you get subscriptions for your new loan (which I think is rather doubtful) but then put right out again so that you have a standing outgo from the Treasury of $50,000,000. If there should happen to come (as of course there will some day) a pressure when people want to convert their greenbacks into coin, and you have a run on the Treasury at a time when your $50,000,000 are out, it would be a very disagreeable performance. I merely want to state this as one of the reasons why the bill being put in the shape the Senate is likely to put it, I shall not vote for it at all.

Mr. TELLER. The word "temporarily" and the words in the seventh and eighth lines and part of the ninth ought to go together.

Mr. BAYARD. That should be so.

Mr. ALLISON. Let all that be considered as one amendment.

Mr. TELLER. It was so voted on last night.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be taken as a whole and read together.

Mr. BAYARD. I was about to suggest that, to make the matter intelligible, the whole of the amendment should be read together, that on line 3 and that on lines 6, 7, and 8.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be reported together and acted on as a whole.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, after the word "use," in line 2, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole inserted "temporarily," and in line 6, after the word "act," insert "which shall from time to time be repaid and replaced out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Before this vote is taken I should be glad to ask a question of the Committee on Finance. Has the matter been considered by that committee at all whether this amendment taken as a whole can affect the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to strengthen the reserve fund in the Treasury by the sale of the old bonds, the fours, the four-and-a-halfs, and fives? Is it possible that any construction can be put upon these words that would affect or limit his power now existing to strengthen that fund by the sale of any bonds authorized by the funding act of 1870?

Mr. BAYARD. No, I think not.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is a matter that struck me as possible and I wanted to know whether the committee had considered it or not.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 4, line 12, after the words "bonds or," to strike out "certificates" and insert "Treasury notes authorized by this act."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 4, line 13, after the words "bonds and," to strike out "certificates" and insert "Treasury notes."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, in section 5, line 1, to strike out "May" and insert "July;" so as to read:

From and after the 1st day of July, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation, &c.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BLAIR. Is an amendment at this time in order, or shall I wait until the remaining amendments are disposed of?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If it is an amendment to the amendment just reported, it is in order.

Mr. BLAIR. It is an amendment to the section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An amendment to the section will be received.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I move to amend, after the word "circulation," in the fourth line of the fifth section, by the insertion of the words "issued after that date."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest as a mere matter of orderly convenience in the practice of the Senate, that there are still amendments made in Committee of the Whole not acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had suggested that. The Chair will recognize the Senator from New Hampshire when the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole shall have been acted on.

Mr. BLAIR. They are to subsequent sections.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. After the amendments shall have been concluded the Chair will recognize the Senator from New Hampshire.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to insert as section 6——

Mr. BAYARD. I was in hopes that the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire would be considered in connection with the amendment we have just had before us. Section 5 is what was termed yesterday and I think properly, the coercive section, the compulsory section, that shall prescribe to the national banks the only description of Government securities that are to be the basis of their circulation. As I understood the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, it was to rectify that which I believe will be a cause of great danger and shock to the business of the country that a restriction be placed by law upon the banks that shall compel them to take these bonds and these bonds only as a basis of circulation. If therefore it be in order, I would suggest to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire to move his proposed amendment to the amendment made in Committee of the Whole to the fifth section so that the Senate may really again contemplate the result of the vote they passed last night.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will remind the Senator that there is no amendment made as in Committee of the Whole to section 5 unacted upon. When the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole shall be acted upon, then amendments generally to any portion of the bill will be in order.

Mr. ALLISON. As we are upon the question of orderly proceeding, I want to suggest now that section 7, which we shall reach in a minute, be passed over until a later stage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have not disposed of section 6 yet.

Mr. ALLISON. When we come to section 7, then it will be time enough to make my suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole embracing section 6 is before the Senate, and will be read.

Mr. BAYARD. My object is to have a yea-and-nay vote of the Senate upon the question of striking out section 5 of the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A new motion to strike it out must be made as it now is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sees from the bill as acted upon yesterday that the Senator from Delaware desired a yea-and-nay vote to be taken on striking out section 5.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will have to be made by a motion after the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole are disposed of, because that section or part of the bill the Committee of the Whole refused to strike out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is true. The Secretary will now report section 6. The purpose of the Senator from Delaware can be reached in order hereafter.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole is to insert as an additional section:

SEC. 6. That the payment of any of the bonds hereby authorized, after the expiration of five years, shall be made in amounts to be determined from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, the bonds so to be paid to be distinguished and described by the dates and numbers, beginning for each successive payment with the bonds of each class last dated and numbered; of the time of which intended payment or redemption the Secretary of the Treasury shall give public notice, and the interest on the particular bonds so selected at any time to be paid shall cease at the expiration of thirty days from the publication of such notice.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I suggest that section 7 be passed over for the present till we ascertain what is the judgment of the Senate upon some other questions to be raised.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa. Now, as the Chair understands, yesterday the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance to strike out section 5 in the text of the House bill as it came was rejected, and the question is, will the Senate concur in the action of the Committee of the Whole refusing to strike out the section, on which the Senator from Delaware demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. THURMAN. That being the text of the bill, is it not necessary that a motion shall be made in the Senate to strike it out?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly it is; the Senator from Delaware moved it, I understood.

Mr. THURMAN. The question is then on striking out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. THURMAN. I am in favor of retaining the section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on striking out the section, and the yeas and nays are called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to inquire whether the amendment that I desire to move should be moved at this time; or should it await the result of the vote on the motion to strike out?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An amendment to perfect the section is first in order.

Mr. BLAIR. Then I move, in line 4, after the word "circulation," to insert "issued after that date;" so as to read:

From and after the 1st day of May, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation issued after that date.

I wish to make one more inquiry of the President, as there is some disagreement among Senators learned in parliamentary law. I wish to inquire whether the amendment to insert these words after "circulation," in line 4, will be equally in order if it should not be moved until after the vote to strike out the entire section is taken?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the motion more properly in order now.

Mr. LOGAN. I would like to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire whether his amendment would not accomplish the object more certainly and be more desirable if he should let it apply to national banks organized after that time on their circulation?

Mr. BLAIR. I have contemplated both forms of phraseology.

Mr. LOGAN. For instance, a bank may reduce its circulation and then again increase it. In that way confusion may arise between the banks in the different securities they would have to keep in the Treasury. Would it not be proper—because I think that is the intention—to apply it to the banks that are organized after this date?

Mr. BLAIR. In reply to that suggestion, I will say that the purpose I wish to accomplish would be better accomplished in that way, because I believe the entire section is one which should be stricken out; but it was the indication of the votes cast by the Senate last night that the judgment of the Senate was to retain the section, and I had hoped to obtain a modification of it less radical than that which is suggested by the Senator from Illinois. I had contemplated the amendment in both forms of phraseology, and erased from the amendment as I have offered it the words which he has suggested. I had desired to take the intimation of the Chair as to the order of discussion, and I should prefer to offer the amendment after action by the Senate upon the motion to strike out the entire section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is not the parliamentary proceeding, as the Chair understands it. The present incumbent was not in the chair when the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from New Hampshire will pardon me, I will call the attention of the Chair to the thirty-first rule, which says:

> If the question in debate contain several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided; but the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition—

That does not touch this case—> nor shall it prevent a motion simply to strike out.

Then comes this provision:

> Nor shall the rejection of a motion to strike out prevent a motion to strike out and insert.

Now the Senator from Delaware moves to strike out this section. Suppose that motion is rejected; the section is still left open to amendment, not to repeat a motion to strike out altogether, but open to any amendment just as it was before, by force of this rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont is unquestionably right. The Chair had overlooked that rule.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I will presume that a motion is made to strike out the fifth section and it does not prevail. If the Senator from New Hampshire shall then propose to strike out the fifth section and insert something else, that motion would be in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unquestionably.

Mr. HAMLIN. It would not be in order to move simply to insert particular words, because the Senate by its vote has agreed to the section precisely as it is. So the Senator from Vermont is misleading the Senator from New Hampshire, I fear.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I propose to move to insert after the word "circulation," in line 4 of the fifth section, the words "issued after that date." The section as it now stands provides that from and after the 1st day of July, 1881, nothing shall be received as security for the circulation issued to the national banks but these 3 per cent. bonds which it is proposed to issue in this refunding process. I desire the modification of this section in such a way that the rule requiring the deposition of that class of bonds as a security for the circulation shall apply only to such circulation as shall be issued to the banks after that date. That is the modification which I desire. I understood during the discussion last night that the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] had no objection to that modification. I suppose it may be that upon further reflection he sees, what is the fact, that without such an amendment as I propose there will be serious embarrassment to the working of the section as it now stands. I look upon it as a matter vital to the character of the bill.

There would be no injustice, it seems to me, in the section if it should be amended in the manner which I have endeavored to point out, because then it would be optional with every bank whether to take more circulation, basing its banking to that extent upon this character of security, or not. All banks would then have notice, in other words, of the existing law, and might act one way or the other, as they might think to be to their interest; but, as the section now stands, it is far different.

With reference to whatever circulation the banks now possess, with reference to their entire business condition and affairs, in the position occupied by them, into which they have been led by the existing law and practice of the Government, they will be very seriously affected by the provisions of the bill as it stands. They will be obliged to surrender their 5 and 6 per cent. bonds, of course, in this process of refunding. More than half of the circulation of the national banks at present is secured by 5 and 6 per cent. bonds. That will be taken up, at all events. They will then be obliged to bank upon a 4 or a 4½ per cent. bond, which would of itself be a large reduction of the income of the banks if no such section as the one here proposed should exist at all. I say they would be obliged to do it. They would be obliged by their business interests to do it, because, of course, they would prefer to bank upon that bond which gives them the highest rate of interest attainable, and consequently they would not naturally do business to any extent upon the 3 per cent. bond which we propose to issue in this continued refunding process. Even doing business upon the 4 or 4½ per cent. bonds, the income of the banks must be very largely decreased.

The average interest now received is upward of 5 per cent. upon the bonds of the United States which are in the hands of the banks as a security for their circulation. Suppose that after the enactment of this law, and after the redemption of the fives and sixes, the banks should continue to do business upon fours and four-and-a-halfs, and take the average interest at 4¼, assuming that they bank upon an equal proportion of each, then the income of the national banks annually is reduced three-fourths and more than three-fourths of 1 per cent. It is the difference between a 5 per cent. bond and a 4 or 4½ per cent., averaging the latter at 4¼. Then the reduction of the income of the national banks throughout the country will be at least three-fourths of 1 per cent. by that change.

Now this bill, as it at present stands, proposes at one fell swoop to reduce the income of the banks on their bonds deposited to secure circulation 1¼ per cent. more, and to make that reduction compulsory. That undoubtedly is, in the minds of many of the supporters of the bill, the principal and most enticing feature in it. It completely changes its character, in my view, from what would be indicated by its title, "A bill to facilitate the refunding of the national debt." If the purpose of the bill with this section inserted is simply to facilitate refunding, I ask what necessity there is of any provision in reference to the nature of the bonded security which a bank shall file with the Department in order to secure its circulation. Of course the circulation of the bank is better secured by placing on deposit with the Department 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds, because the 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds are the more valuable, and therefore the purpose of this provision cannot be to facilitate the process of refunding at all. I think it is quite the contrary.

The necessity of refunding seems to be recognized by everybody—not necessity in the strict sense of the word, but the desirableness of that result. Every one admits the extreme desirableness of action whereby the existing surplus of capital in the country shall be called in at this time, when it can be obtained at a low rate per cent. to redeem the outstanding bonds of the Government at higher rates of interest, the fives and sixes. A bill for that purpose, whose chief object and effect was to carry out that purpose, and which was prepared and enacted by Congress and made operative throughout the country for that purpose, and that alone, in good faith, would be exceedingly desirable, but not strictly necessary because we really have to pay no more than $700,000 or $800,000 during the ensuing year. We are not obliged to pay more than that; we may pay, and we propose by a funding bill to pay a great deal more because we expect to get the capital at a lower rate now than we may by and by. The actual necessity is not upon us to pay the amount of a single million for many months to come; but nevertheless a measure to secure the funding of our securities at a reduced interest is desirable.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him to ask a question for my own information?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I understood the Senator to say that if the banks should surrender their fives and sixes which are to be taken up and which are now on deposit to secure their circulation, and if they should be deprived of the power of buying fours and four-and-a-halfs and depositing them, that would be a loss to the banks of three-fourths of 1 per cent. a year.

Mr. BLAIR. One and one-fourth per cent. at least.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senator if that can possibly be, provided the banks have to buy the fours and four-and-a-halfs at 13 or 14 per cent. premium? If a bank invests in four-and-a-halfs at 120 or in fours at 113 or 114, pray how much interest will it get on its investment?

Mr. EATON. Three and fifteen hundredths per cent.

Mr. THURMAN. Then it is 3.15 instead of 3 per cent.

Mr. BLAIR. In the argument I make I am assuming that the banks may be allowed to substitute 4 per cent. bonds, many of which are still unsold, as a means of redemption of their circulation on the original conditions under which they were issued and became a form of security allowed to be deposited by the banks for their circulation.

Mr. President, I think that what I have said must demonstrate the fact that the real purpose of this bill as it now stands cannot be to facilitate the process of refunding at all. I have heard no suggestion based upon the bill as it is which I can understand as in any sense whatever facilitating the process of refunding by any means. Now, what is the purpose and what is the necessary effect of this fifth section? I can see none whatever, except that it is a blow at the existence of the national banking system which is radical in its nature. I believe that it is utterly impossible for the national banking system of the United States to continue to exist if by virtue of any legislation which we may enact the profits of the banks are largely reduced. We well know that even as it is at the present time with the fives and the sixes deposited by the banks and they drawing the full rate per cent. on those higher bonds, and many of them having fours and four-and-a-halfs deposited, the great majority of the national banks in number in the United States are doing business either at a loss or with such an exceedingly narrow profit that there is hardly one of them which does not contemplate the surrender of its circulation.

There are some 2,095 national banks in the United States. Of these 1,859 are what are known as country banks, and more than three-fourths of the national-bank circulation now among the people is issued through banks which have a capital of less than half a million dollars each. Many of the city banks have surrendered from time to time their circulation, not finding it profitable to keep it with the existing interest upon the bonds of the United States. I live in a State which has a reasonable number of banks for a population of 350,000. We have something like twenty banks, and I do not know a single bank in the State of New Hampshire whose directors and managers have not been for a considerable time contemplating the surrender of their circulation. This very morning I have conversed with a gentleman, who happens to be stopping in this city temporarily, who is connected with our most prosperous bank in the city of Manchester, the First National Bank of that city, and it has been a matter of solemn contemplation and discussion with them for several months whether they would not do better to surrender their circulation entirely and do business in some other way, or to close up as a national bank. There is a bank at Littleton, there is a bank at Lancaster, there is a bank at Laconia, there are several banks in Concord, in Manchester, in Nashua, in Dover, and in Portsmouth, and every bank in the State of New Hampshire, if this bill becomes a law and it is obliged to reduce its income from the Government bonds in the vicinity of 2 per cent., as I will show you very soon, will be driven into liquidation, as I believe. If there is any man here who had in his mind the destruction of the national banking system of the United States, he could not have contrived a bill with more fell purpose for its destruction than this.

What is true of the banks in the State of New Hampshire is true of the country banks throughout the United States generally; and the country banks are altogether more important for the prosperity of the great mass of the American people than are the city banks. The city banks can live on their deposits; they do live on their deposits to-day. It is not the profits of the national-bank circulation which enable the two hundred and forty-nine banks in the cities to do business far more profitably than those in the country. The citizen in the country is entitled as much to banking facilities as the citizen in the city; he needs them even more, because his necessities are greater, and if you strike down these country banks you simply ruin the mass of the American people who depend upon them for business facilities. It cannot be otherwise.

I have taken some statistics this morning from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. The national banks of the United States have $57,000,000 of bonds deposited for the purpose of securing circulation, at 6 per cent.; they have $147,000,000 of the 5 per cent. bonds so deposited, making an aggregate of $204,000,000 now drawing 5 and 6 per cent. The remainder of the bonds which are deposited to secure the national-bank circulation, amounting to $167,000,000, are divided between the four and four-and-a-half percents. Of the four-and-a-half percents there are $47,000,000, of the four percents $120,000,000. So that of the four and four-and-a-half percents there are now on deposit to secure circulation $167,000,000; there are on deposit to secure that same circulation, drawing interest at 5 and 6 per cent., $204,000,000; very largely more than over half is now secured by bonds which draw interest at the rate of 5 and 6 per cent.

The entire national-banking business, including the city as well as the country banks, is now done subject to a tax of 3.2 per cent., taking the whole country together. By the reduction of the income of the bonds, which would result from the compulsory substitution of a 3 per cent. bond as security for the entire mass of the circulation, there would be a reduction of the income of the banks, as any one can see, by casting the interest upon these amounts which I have given, of at least 1.7 per cent., practically 2 per cent., which, of course, being a deduction from the income of the bonds, is precisely the same in its effect as though by virtue of the laws of the land we increased the taxation on the banks 1.7 or 2 per cent. This would give 4.9 per cent. of taxation practically upon the business of the national banks of the country as a whole, including the city banks as well as the country banks. The injury to the country banks would be very much larger in proportion, because, as a rule, their business is less profitable than that of the city banks.

The national banks have over two hundred thousand stockholders scattered all over the country; and the average ownership is only some two thousand four hundred dollars. Can even the city banks prosperously continue to do business as national banks with a practical addition to their taxation of nearly 2 per cent.? The country banks must suffer very much more largely than those of the cities. The result will inevitably be, as I believe—I can see no other possible solution of the difficulty—the forced liquidation of so many of the banks as practically to destroy the system.

Some Senators may say that it is not much matter if the national banks are forced into liquidation; that some other agency will take their place; that State banks may be a better form of banking for the people than the national banks. The State banking system, of course, has many and zealous advocates; but I do not for one believe that any advantages will result to the country from the substitution of a State banking system for the national-bank system. But even conceding the point, everybody must admit that this process of liquidation, this calling in of loans, this compulsory collection of over a billion dollars, which is now loaned out by the country banks alone, being one-half the entire loans of all the national banks of the United States, will fall with the utmost weight and with the most destructive tendency upon the business interests of the great mass of the people. The heavy banks in the cities, speculators, the class of men who are to take these bonds under the operation of a syndicate, may be able to bear this; but the people of my State cannot, and I believe the people in the State of Kansas, so efficiently represented by my friend here, will find very great difficulty in realizing upon their indebtedness to the national banks so as to enable them to liquidate by the compulsory collection of their debts.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to one other thing. These national banks go by a name which may possibly be not inoffensive to some people; and yet it does seem to me that in reality they ought to be considered as State banks and not as national banks. The men who have invested their capital in these institutions were the same men who owned the capital of the State banks before the war, and as largely as they can they invest still in State banks; but the Government of the United States enacted a system of finance for its own advantage, not theirs, which compelled them, if they would avoid the destruction of their capital, to make their investments in national banks. They are the individual men of the States; they live in the States; they are in all their various relations and interests citizens of the States; and you cannot strike at the capital in the States, invested even though it may be under the name of a national bank, and you cannot strike at their interests, without striking at precisely the same individuals and at precisely the same interests which are involved in the State banks themselves. The national banks represent precisely the same local interests to-day that were formerly represented by the State banks whose capital by compulsion of the National Government was forced into the form of national banking or into annihilation. The larger part of this capital is to-day banking upon the national securities involuntarily. It were better for that capital to-day, if the intervening and destructive process could be gotten over, to be invested in banking upon local securities which might yield 6 or 8 per cent. instead of 3 or 4 or 4½ per cent. on Government bonds which they deposit as security for circulation.

Mr. President, I am taking more time than belongs to me this morning; but I wish to call attention to one other point, and that is the element of good faith in our dealing with the national banks. When we compelled their organization we chartered them; we gave them a long existence, for twenty years. It is true that we reserved the right to alter, to amend, or to repeal the charter when the public good might require it; but no court of the United States, and no other court, has ever yet decided that this power to alter, amend, and repeal a charter involves the right to confiscate property, to destroy property; nor does it give, as I believe, any right to the Government of the United States to impose conditions upon the business of national banking which are in principle destructive of that business. I think I have shown by a mere computation that the enactment of this section will inevitably destroy these national banks and compel their liquidation.

The Government having given to each national bank its existence, and having forced it thus to exist, I ask if it is right, if it is an honest thing for the Government of the United States so to legislate as to accomplish the practical destruction of this great interest, or, if not of the whole interest, of a great many of the banks. These banks are organized individually. Each one of the 2,095 has a separate charter, and the contract of the Government with that individual bank cannot be so violated as to result in the destruction of that individual bank and the Government still claim that it is acting in good faith, as it seems to me.

If we mean to compel the banks to take this loan, I can see how we by the grasp of power may try to enact that the banks shall cease to exist; that they shall be ultimately destroyed or that they shall take this loan; but if we are willing to go into the market and pay a fair price for the use of money why should we undertake to force the taking of the bonds upon the national banks? If we are giving a fair price for the use of money, can we not go into the open market and command the capital of others than those who are in control of these banks as well as of the banks themselves?

I believe that the hour fixed for taking the vote upon the bill is two o'clock. In view of that fact, as a matter of necessity, a great deal that I would be glad to say upon so extensive a subject as this must be omitted. I am certainly not oblivious to the fact that there are many others in this body who doubtless would discuss this subject-matter much better than I can myself; and therefore I will now yield the floor, entering my protest most solemnly against the enactment of this fifth section, as in my belief a practical breach of good faith on the part of the United States with the banks, as an entirely unnecessary measure, and as really one which makes the entire bill practically one for the destruction of the banking system, rather than one to facilitate the funding of the national debt.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to make a suggestion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WHYTE in the chair.) Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. I suggest, as we have agreed unanimously to take the vote on this measure at two o'clock, that during the hour which remains speeches be limited to five minutes to each Senator upon any subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware proposes that by unanimous consent speeches upon this subject be limited to five minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As an understanding between Senators, and not as an order of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As an understanding only.

Mr. BECK. As I have the floor I should not like to yield for that, still I hope not to occupy more than five or six minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky object?

Mr. BECK. I should rather speak first.

Mr. BAYARD. I asked unanimous consent. Of course the Senator from Kentucky can object to it.

Mr. BECK. I have the floor, and I think I will say all I desire in five minutes if not interrupted. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR] has referred to something that I said yesterday evening, that is really the only reason why I care about saying anything. He suggested that I had agreed to this proposition or thought it was right.

Mr. BLAIR. I beg the Senator's pardon. If I have given that impression I wish to withdraw it, and if I have in any way said anything that is offensive to the Senator it has been entirely without design, and there will be no excuse for taking five minutes upon that subject.

Mr. BECK. I merely rose to say that as soon as I understood the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire, as suggested last night, I observed to him that I thought it would be absolutely fatal to the fifth section of the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator did so.

Mr. BECK. And I have now no doubt of it. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] in the question he put to the Senator from New Hampshire developed that fact conclusively, and if anything more was needed the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire has made it absolutely certain. The reason urged why the fifth section should apply only to national-bank circulation issued after the 1st day of May or the 1st of July as now amended, is that if we require the present national banks to take it we will absolutely destroy them. The Senator insists that all the banks that are now in existence or that have now circulation on their hands shall have the right after that time to choose any bonds that they may see fit, and deposit whatever bonds to secure circulation they please after that day, while every new bank that is hereafter organized, or each bank that requires an increase of circulation after that time, shall be required to use 3 per cent. bonds, and the Senator from New Hampshire contends that the use of the 3 per cent. bonds to be deposited as security for circulation is absolutely ruinous to the banking interest and destructive of the system. What is the meaning of that? Simply this: that we shall provide in this law that the present banks shall have a monopoly for all time to come of the whole banking business; that no new banks shall be organized, because he says that no bank can live under this law, but he contends that the old banks shall have a right to deposit any bonds they may see fit not only after the 1st day of July, but to trade in any set of securities, as they now do under the fourth section of the act of 1874, it being a fixed monopoly to them to the exclusion of all competition. That is the meaning of the proposed amendment.

If we are to continue to have free banking and if all banks are to be equal, some provision ought to be made whereby all banks in the future shall have equal rights without divesting them of existing rights. The proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire is that banks that are organized after the 1st of July, or banks that increase their circulation after that date, shall not have the right which he says is indispensable to successful banking, and which he proposes to give to those now in existence; he thus maintains a monopoly in the hands of the present bankers to the exclusion of all others, preventing the organization of new banks, and making a discrimination in favor of existing banks, and destroys the bonds we now seek to sell if his ideas are in any regard correct.

Mr. ROLLINS. I rise to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky, in case the fifth section of the bill as it passed the House is agreed to by the Senate, how it will be possible to secure equal rights to all the banks? It is an absolute impossibility if the section is agreed to.

Mr. BECK. It will be absolutely impossible, if the argument of the Senator's colleague is true, for any new bank to organize, because it will not organize upon a ruinous basis, and the old banks now organized upon another basis may maintain and deposit any bond they please, and are not required to purchase any other, and no one else shall have anything; for, as he maintains, it absolutely excludes all others, as they will be ruined if they take the bonds we now propose that they shall take.

Mr. ROLLINS. I think all the banks of the country ought to have an equal privilege under the law.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BECK. Not now, as the Senator from Delaware wants me to yield the floor in five minutes.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask that the Senator's time be extended without any limitation on it so far as I interrupt him. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I say explicitly that no bank will be organized in my belief if this becomes a law, and the old banks cannot continue to do business upon this basis at all; and I say if we attempt so to legislate in regard to persons who have their capital invested that they cannot reasonably do private business——

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. I do not believe that any more currency will go out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the floor and does not yield.

Mr. BECK. In answer to the last suggestion I will state that the whole argument was presented in the report of Judge Chase when he was Secretary of the Treasury, in advocating a national banking system. He said that the leading if not the whole object of it was to enable us to make sale of the bonds of the United States. That was the ground on which the whole national-bank system was made to rest. Then the only bonds were six percents, we had nothing else. The law of 1864 provided that no bonds should be received as security for national-bank circulation unless they bore an interest of 5 per cent. or over. In 1870 Congress passed the refunding act. We withdrew all these sixes; we issued fives, four-and-a-halfs, and fours, and we required the national banks to surrender all the sixes they then held, and take fives, four-and-a-halfs, and fours. The fives have now matured, and we seek to refund them at the lowest rate of interest we can. Have we not the same right to refund them by the issue of any bond that is necessary for the good of the Government as we had to refund the sixes, and require the banks to take the bonds we then issued? Have we not the same right to refund the fives and sixes if in the judgment of Congress it is best for the Government of the United States—the Senator from New Hampshire admits that—and reduce the rate of interest that we are paying by fifteen million and a quarter dollars annually, because that is the reduction? The national-bank system is to continue, and it is to continue alone upon the United States bonds. Have we not a right to require all our own corporations, as national banks are, to take the bonds that we propose to issue in order to save the tax-payers over fifteen million dollars a year by refunding the fives and sixes? The Senator's argument would be that we are obliged to deprive ourselves of the right to refund any of the debts of the United States in order to get a lower rate of interest bond during the twenty years that the national-bank charters were allowed to run, because it would be a violation of faith to make them take bonds at a lower rate of interest than they held at the time the charter was issued; that it was their right under the charter to hold that particular class of bonds for twenty years, and thus draw 6 per cent. interest. That was the argument of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Kentucky a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to debate, but merely to ask a question. I understood the Senator to say a moment ago that the fives and sixes we required the national banks to take in the same sense, I suppose, that this requisition is——

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator would kindly point out the law requiring it, I should be very glad to see it.

Mr. BECK. That may take quite a little time. I read it yesterday.

Mr. BLAIR. While the Senator is looking for the law I will just say——

Mr. BECK. Here it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BECK. I am really occupying too much of the time of the Senate and the Senator from Delaware is justly warranted in complaining that I am taking too much time. In 1864 Congress passed this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the date of the act to which the Senator refers?

Mr. BECK. The act of March 3, 1864, section 21:

> That upon the transfer and delivery of bonds to the Treasurer, as provided in the foregoing section, the association making the same shall be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations, in blank, registered and countersigned as hereinafter provided, equal in amount to 90 per cent. of the current market value of the United States bonds so transferred and delivered, but not exceeding 90 per cent. of the amount of said bonds at the par value thereof, if bearing interest at a rate not less than 5 per cent. per annum; and at no time shall the total amount of such notes, issued to any such association, exceed the amount at such time actually paid in of its capital stock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator think, if I may ask him, that that was a requirement on an existing bank that had certain securities of the United States that it had taken according to law, to give those up and take others?

Mr. BECK. Yes, whenever these bonds had to be refunded; and they have been required to give them up. They were required to give them up by the act of 1870, and they were required to furnish themselves with other bonds that the United States saw fit to issue, at 5, 4, and 4½ per cent., instead of the sixes they previously held, and now as the fives mature we have a right to replace them, upon the best terms we can, with other bonds; we have a right to refund, of course, and issue any bond that it is for the good of the Government and of the people to issue, and if they determine to hold on to the banking institutions and continue their business they have the privilege of taking the bonds we now give them. Surely we are not to be prevented from paying our debt or reducing the interest on it merely because the national banks do not like to give up the bonds they have.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to inquire, while I do not dispute the power and right of the United States to redeem any bond that is redeemable, (whether a bank holds it or anybody else,) how the Senator construes the other part of this section in respect of banks that hold bonds that are not yet redeemable. Are they obliged to give those up and take these new bonds?

Mr. BECK. I will answer that in a moment. This refunding act only applies to the fives and sixes. We have $730,000,000 of four percents outstanding that will not mature until 1907. We have $250,000,000 of four-and-a-half percents not redeemable until 1891. Thus we have nearly a thousand million dollars of bonds that the banks not only have a right to hold, notwithstanding this refunding act, but they have the right from now until the 1st of July to convert the fives and sixes we are now seeking to redeem into fours and four-and-a-halfs, and to the extent that they do so they will not be required to buy a single bond of the issue we are now seeking to provide for; so that the difficulty of the Senator from New Hampshire is not so great as he thinks it is, because if they do not wish to take the 3 per cent. bond they have a right to buy any amount of the thousand million of fours and four-and-a-halfs outstanding—$750,000,000 of which is not demandable until 1907 and $250,000,000 of which is not demandable until 1891. They can, I repeat, convert if they like all their present fives and sixes at any time between now and the date this act takes effect, and then they will not be required to buy a single one of the bonds we are now to issue; so that there is in fact no compulsion or coercion upon them in any such sense as is claimed by the Senator from New Hampshire, or by the opponents of the fifth section of this bill.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir; I shall yield the floor entirely in a moment.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the Senator very properly to argue that all national banks ought to be on the same basis?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I want to know if all of the banks that have now deposited in the Treasury 4 and 4½ per cent. bonds will not bank on one basis, and all other banks that are required to take 3 per cent. bonds on another basis?

Mr. BECK. Yes; to this extent: the banks that are now holding fours and four-and-a-halfs which we do not seek to refund, or that will be unredeemable after the 1st day of July, if the Senate amendment as to time takes effect, can purchase the fours and four-and-a-halfs not maturing until 1891 or 1907. There will be that difference over banks that do not organize until the 1st day of July, 1881, whatever that difference may be. I think it will not be enough to prevent new national banks from organizing, if indeed there will be any difference between a 3 per cent. at par and a 4 per cent. at the premium it bears.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator made a very strong argument against the injustice of such a condition of things, and brought home to the Senator from New Hampshire the charge that he wished to build up a monopoly in the existing banks.

Mr. BECK. That is going to lead to a speech, I know, and I am obliged to decline to yield further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky declines to yield.

Mr. BECK. It means this, that we are seeking to deprive no man of a vested right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The same difference exists now between banks that hold fives and sixes and those that hold only four-and-a-halfs.

Mr. BECK. Certainly; that is true as my colleague very well states. Until we had the right to redeem them we did not interfere with the banks that saw fit to hold fives and sixes, nor do we interfere with those banks that hold fours and four-and-a-halfs, all of these being bonds that they had a right to deposit. We seek to deprive them of no right. We only propose after July to change the law. In 1870 we took all the 6 per cent. bonds away from them and coerced them, if you please, to use that term, to take fives and four-and-a halfs and fours, and now when the fives and sixes mature, when the right of the United States has accrued to pay off all those bonds, it is the duty of the United States to require them to substitute bonds at a lower rate of interest if the United States can do so, and no one doubts our authority. We now can refund these fives and sixes at a much lower rate of interest than we are paying, and by so doing will save fifteen and a quarter millions of dollars to the tax-payers of the country. Will it be contended that we have not a right to refund those bonds now, at the lowest rate of interest possible? Are we the agents of the national banks? Did they not know when they took these bonds how long they had to run and that it was our duty to reduce the rate of interest on them and to refund them at the lowest rate possible when our right accrued? We are now seeking to do that. They knew that they were obliged by law and their own charters to deposit United States bonds as security for their circulation, such bonds as we see fit to order them to take. We now say to them in this refunding act that all who apply to increase the circulation after July 1, 1881, or any bank that will see fit to organize after that time, shall take the bonds we are now issuing in order to make a demand for the new bonds and in order to save fifteen and a quarter million dollars, or failing to do that, they shall not go into that business or obtain more circulation. They will take them. There need be no apprehension about that. The Senator from New Hampshire speaks of the oppressive taxation upon the national banks and upon their capital.

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BECK. Not now, if the Senator will permit me to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky will not yield.

Mr. BECK. There are a thousand banks now that pay no tax whatever on their capital.

Mr. BLAIR. And get no income whatever.

Mr. BECK. Every bank that has only $50,000 of capital is obliged to keep on deposit $50,000 of United States bonds, and the law provides that a national bank shall only pay a tax upon its capital in excess of the United States bonds held by it. As the law requires a bank to keep $50,000 even if it has a banking capital of only $50,000 all that class of banks that keep $50,000 do not pay one dollar of tax on their capital. In this the national banks have an unjust advantage over private bankers and banks organized under State authority, for a bank side by side with them that does not hold United States bonds has to pay one-half of 1 per cent. tax per annum upon all its capital, and so with all private property. There is where the difficulty comes in, and there is where the advantage accrues to the national banks.

Mr. BALDWIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan asks the Senator from Kentucky to yield for a question. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir, I will; but I am consuming too much time.

Mr. BALDWIN. I should like to have the Senator from Kentucky inform the Senate if there is now or ever has been on the statute-books a law which required national banks to deposit as security for their circulation or for the safe-keeping of public moneys any particular class of United States bonds to the exclusion of others? Is there now or has there ever been upon the statute-books a law requiring a national bank to deposit as security for its circulation or for the safe-keeping of public moneys intrusted to it any particular class of United States bonds?

Mr. BECK. I think the law of 1864 provided that they should take nothing but bonds bearing at least 5 per cent. interest or over.

Mr. BALDWIN. I believe there has never been upon our statute-books a law requiring the deposit of any particular class of United States bonds similar to the law now proposed to be enacted in the fifth section of the bill under consideration.

Mr. BECK. Whether that is so or not, we have changed the character of their bonds over and over again since their charters were granted to them, and they hold, as I have said, all their rights subject to the higher right of the United States to pay the lowest rate of interest upon their bonds, and to fund, whenever a bond is fundable, any of their outstanding obligations. No man can deny that, and our right and duty to do that is paramount to all minor considerations.

If the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire should prevail, (and that is the main point on which I rose to speak,) it is simply to preclude hereafter, according to his theory, the new banks that may be organized after July 1 or the banks that may increase their circulation after July 1 from bearing the same relation to the Government that the banks now existing do, and to give existing banks, if his argument is true, a monopoly of the whole banking system; and all this is to be done under the pretense that banking is free and equal. The Senator from New Hampshire greatly mistakes if he thinks that there is any tax imposed upon a national bank that is not imposed upon a private bank, except the 1 per cent. upon its circulation. Every private banker and every State banker pays every dollar of tax that the national banker pays, except the tax on the circulation, and he pays in addition a tax upon the capital, whereas the national banks that hold bonds to the extent of their capital pay no tax upon their capital, and to that extent the national banker gets the advantage. Why should he not pay it on his circulation? The United States furnishes it to him. The United States has to keep gold in large amount lying in the Treasury bearing no interest in order to make these national-bank notes secure, because it is redeemable in greenbacks, and the gold that is kept lying idle in the Treasury is lying there as security for the national-bank notes as much as it is for the legal-tender notes of the United States. All these securities are for the benefit of the national bankers. We furnish them all their circulation, do all the printing of the notes for nothing, change the notes, as I showed yesterday, whenever they want them changed—we do everything for them—and is not that worth the 1 per cent. charged, if there was nothing else of value in their circulation? That 1 per cent. is all they are charged beyond what other bankers pay. I maintain it would be far better to strike out the fifth section altogether than adopt the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire and make the discrimination in favor of banks now existing which he obviously seeks to make.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I shall not take any time to discuss the value of the tendency of this bill to go back to wildcat State money; I leave that to the good sense of Senators and their wishes, without any argument of mine; but I should like to know from the supporters of the fifth section what they mean precisely by the provisions, without going into all of them, of section 5, in the twentieth, twenty-first, and twenty-second lines, providing:

That section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The fourth section provides:

That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, in whole or in part, may, upon the deposit of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $9,000, take up the bonds which said association has on deposit with the Treasurer for the security of such circulating notes.

It then goes on to provide for detail. That seems to mean that although a bank is willing to bank upon legal-tender notes which draw no interest at all, it shall no longer be allowed to do so; that it shall not give security in legal-tender notes for the deposits of the United States with it; but that it must give security in an interest-bearing obligation of the United States as if it were for the interest of the United States to keep out interest-bearing securities, and not to keep out securities that do not bear interest. Is that what they mean? I cannot take time to discuss it.

I should like to know another thing. The next provision in this section is that "sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, re-enacted." Why do you re-enact a standing provision of the laws of the United States?

Mr. BECK. That was very well explained last night, but the Senator did not happen to be here. In the RECORD of this morning the reason for it is given and there is a statement of the Treasurer as to why it should be done. It was explained very fully last night.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the explanation that those sections would be repealed by force of this act without this clause?

Mr. BECK. That those two sections ought to be restored, and the fourth section of the act of 1874 ought to be repealed in the interest of fair banking.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me, the theory is that the act of 1874 repealed pro tanto those two sections of the Revised Statutes, and the House in repealing the act of 1874, desired to revive them. That is all there is of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly; that is why the two things come together; and to learn that was precisely the object of my inquiry.

Section 5159, which precedes the act that I have read, provides that any banking association commencing banking shall transfer and deliver to the Treasurer certain registered bonds, &c. That does not touch this question of the act of 1874. Then section 5160 provides that deposits of bonds made by such association, as its capital is increased, &c., may be increased, and that if it desires to close up its business it may take up its bonds upon returning to the Comptroller its circulating notes, &c. Then, repealing the act of 1874 and reviving the act of 1873 in the Revised Statutes has the effect possibly and apparently, probably (I have not had time enough to examine it to have a definite opinion, I only call the attention of the Senate to it) of putting the law into that condition where hereafter it will be impossible for the national banks to bank on legal-tender notes of the United States as allowed by the act of 1874. And here I may say as to the national banks that happily I have in them no interest exceeding about two thousand dollars, I believe; I wish it were a great deal more. The object here seems to be to compel the national banks to bank upon bonds bearing interest instead of banking upon the legal-tender notes of the United States, which the act of 1874 allowed.

I should be glad to know upon what policy of the public welfare, inasmuch as the legal-tender notes are payable directly on demand in coin, it is that a banker, if he did not care to take the interest on bonds, and preferred to have legal-tender notes, should not be allowed to do so, for the interest of the public; I am not speaking of his interest; I can hardly imagine a case where it would be to his interest. But why you are to compel him by law to bank upon an interest-bearing obligation instead of an obligation payable in coin on demand as a security for the bill-holder, or the depositor, or the creditor of the bank, in distinction from the other methods, I am quite unable to see. I will not take any more of the time of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. If in order now, I renew the suggestion I made before the Senator from Kentucky commenced his remarks, that by unanimous consent no Senator shall occupy more than five minutes in debating a question on this measure. It is now beyond the hour of one o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is it the pleasure of the Senate to come to such an understanding among Senators? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so understood.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, I intend to support the amendment of the committee with respect to the fifth section, and I will state my reason for doing so. If I had believed at any time during the progress of this debate that a 3 per cent. bond could not be floated at par without any compulsion whatever, I should have voted for a bond bearing a higher rate of interest. I am not in favor of compelling the national banks or any individuals to take these bonds unless they elect so to do. Right here I wish to enter a prediction that if the Secretary of the Treasury, whoever he may be, gives the opportunity to the public to subscribe to the Treasury notes at a rate of 2½ per cent. they will be subscribed for and taken at par. With respect to the 3 per cent. bonds, which it appears to be the purpose of some members of the Senate to compel the national banks to take as a basis of banking, I have another prediction to make, that unless the national banks make subscription to the 3 per cent. bonds at an early day they will have the opportunity of paying a large premium upon them.

Therefore, when Senators talk about compelling national banks or any individual or corporation to accept and take these bonds as a basis of banking, they are simply making me appear inconsistent with myself, because I certainly have voted for 3 per cent. bonds believing that they will be floated to the public, and that there will be a race for them something like the race we have witnessed in the city of New York at the soup-houses during times of famine.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask five minutes of the time of the Senate on this subject, for I believe the amendment to be so important in its effect as to cause me—I do not know how it may affect the minds of other gentlemen—to doubt whether I ought to vote for the bill at all unless the fifth section which came from the House is stricken out.

In the first place, it is a new departure in our history of legislation to embrace in such a bill this compulsory feature for the enforced deposit of these bonds by the national banks. Up to this time any registered interest-bearing bond of the United States has been allowed to be received as security for circulation; but now it is proposed to say that none but one series of bonds, and those floated at a very problematical rate of interest, shall be, and shall only be, receivable as a basis of circulation. Then what do you do? You at once discriminate between the banks that are and the banks that are to be founded hereafter.

Under the present state of affairs it is the option of the Government, lawfully and honorably to be exercised, to redeem the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds payable on the 1st of May and the 1st of July of the present year. The banks hold them as all other classes of investors hold them; they are liable to have them redeemed in their hands as all other investors are; but you say to them that they shall not supply their fund of bonds deposited for circulation from any other source than the proposed 3 per cent. loan. That is the compulsion. To-day the banks are under taxation which is justly called war taxation, taxation upon deposits, taxation upon circulation. They are drawing upon 5 and 6 per cent. bonds the interest at those rates; they are liable to have those bonds called in, and no complaint can be made by them on that account. But suppose they shall say "we cannot continue profitably the business of banking and the issue of circulation under a deposit of bonds that bring us but 3 per cent.," that is a practical question. If such shall be their decision, and they shall not replace the bonds that you redeem, what follows? That their currency must be curtailed exactly in that proportion, and I here say to Senators that in my judgment you will inflict a shock and a blow upon the business of this country by producing sharp contraction in many quarters that do not desire it. I do not mean to say that the blow will not come at any rate; but if the deposit of bonds necessary to secure circulation be contracted, of course the circulation must be contracted correspondingly, and therefore I say that in making this change it is a very serious one, especially to that class who have been compelled to invest in United States bonds in order to carry on the important business of banking to obtain a circulation upon which the great bulk of the business of this country is conducted. I say that you are running risk enough upon that without adding the vicious, the un-American, the involuntary feature of compelling them either to go into liquidation or subscribe to this new loan at an unprofitable rate.

Why the feature of banking and banking business and circulation was brought into this funding bill I do not comprehend; it is not germane to the bill; it is not a cognate subject, it ought to be considered separately. It is not wise to embarrass the meaning, the objects, the principles of the funding bill by ingrafting upon it this feature of restricted circulation and of enforced subscription to bonds which are to be the basis of circulation.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have not occupied two minutes on this bill, and therefore I feel like taking advantage of the opportunity to speak five.

I really cannot comprehend the importance of this amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. It must be my stupidity, of course, for he sees it in a very different light, and my friend from Delaware does, I imagine, from what he has said. In the first place if this fifth section be adopted just as it came from the House, it affects no bank whose circulation is secured by 4 or 4½ per cent. bonds. It can only affect those banks whose circulation is secured by 5 and 6 per cent. bonds.

Mr. BAYARD. They hold $212,000,000.

Mr. THURMAN. Let them hold as many as they please. The argument is that when those bonds are taken up the banks owning them will be prevented from depositing fours and four-and-a-halfs and be compelled to deposit threes. Now practically what is the difference to them if they buy the fours or four-and-a-halfs which we are told by our friend before me who is so well informed on this subject will bring the moment this bill is passed a large premium, or take the three percents at par? How will they get more profit out of a 4 per cent. bond at a premium of 14, 16, or 18, than out of a 3 per cent. at par? I say it would be a mere shadow.

The Senator from New Hampshire has drawn a gloomy picture of these banks withdrawing their circulation, or threatening to withdraw it. Why do they do it? Simply to get the premium on the bonds that they have deposited. That is the only reason. I have seen that thing done time and again. When the five-twenties were up at 20 per cent. premium and more, I have seen a bank surrender its circulation in order to get the premium on the five-twenties, and then afterward deposit five percents, and when the five percents were up to about twenty it surrendered its circulation again in order to realize the premium on its bonds, and then deposited four-and-a-halfs. That is all there is in this threat. Let them try it; the people of this country will not suffer much if they do try it.

Sir, talk about crippling these banks! Are there not more private banks in this country than there are chartered banks, and do not these private banks make money with no circulation at all? My friend from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] says there are two thousand and odd national and four thousand and odd private banks. Do not the private banks, without any circulation, make money? Talk to me about national banks winding up their business voluntarily! They do wind up now and then because they make bad debts, because of improvident management, but they do not wind up on account of any provision in regard to their circulation.

Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will not be adopted, and that the fifth section will be retained just as it came from the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR,] which will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "circulation," in line 4 of section 5, it is proposed to insert "issued after that date."

Mr. BLAIR called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered and taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Allison,	Dawes,	Hoar,	Paddock,
Baldwin,	Eaton,	Kernan,	Platt,
Bayard,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Randolph,

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa reserved a vote upon section 7.

Mr. ALLISON. The next motion is the motion of the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Delaware moves to strike out section 5.

Mr. BAYARD. That is the amendment of the Finance Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to strike out section 5.

Mr. PLUMB. As that embraces several propositions, I repeat the suggestion I made last night that there be a division. I think the vote should be first taken on that part of the section down to the word "provided."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks that the question shall be divided and the vote taken first upon striking out that part of section 5 which precedes the word "provided," in line 11. The question will be taken, then, on striking out the first part of the section preceding the word "provided," in line 11.

Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. This is a motion of the Senator from Delaware; it is not the amendment proposed by the committee; it is a motion proposed by the Senator from Delaware to strike out this section. Now, can the Senator from Kansas call for a division of that motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the question can be divided. The yeas and nays are ordered on the motion to strike out that part of the section preceding the word "provided," in line 11.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—29.

Allison,	Blair,	Cameron of Wis.,	Groome,
Anthony,	Burnside,	Dawes,	Hamlin,
Baldwin,	Call,	Eaton,	Hampton,
Bayard,	Cameron of Pa.,	Ferry,	Hill of Colorado,
Hoar,	McMillan,	Platt,	Whyte.
Kernan,	McPherson,	Rollins,
Kirkwood,	Morrill,	Teller,
Logan,	Paddock,	Wallace,

NAYS—32.

Bailey,	Farley,	Lamar,	Slater,
Beck,	Garland,	McDonald,	Thurman,
Booth,	Harris,	Maxey,	Vance,
Brown,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Vest,
Butler,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Ingalls,	Plumb,	Walker,
Coke,	Johnston,	Pugh,	Williams,
Davis of Illinois,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,	Withers.

ABSENT—15.

Blaine,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Nevada,	Saunders,
Bruce,	Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Sharon,
Carpenter,	Grover,	Randolph,	Windom.
Conkling,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

So the motion to strike out was disagreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the proposition to strike out the residue of section 5, to which the Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Delaware. Does the Senator desire a vote upon that portion of the proposition now?

Mr. BAYARD. The division was made at the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not desire any further division of the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on striking out the latter part of section 5, beginning with the word "provided," on line 11.

The motion to strike out was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next question is upon the amendment added in Committee of the Whole as section 7, which was reserved by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. By unanimous consent that section was passed over. The object of passing it over was that we might finally vote on the rate of interest; but I think inasmuch as the Senate has now decided to retain section 5, this section 7 might as well go out, except the last clause.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that there be a division of the vote on section 7. The first three lines of section 7 have been made unnecessary by the very decisive vote of the Senate upon section 5. The words that I think are rendered unnecessary are these:

That the bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be receivable as security for the circulation issued to the national banks.

That has been provided for, I think rather unfortunately but very decisively, by the vote of the Senate.

Mr. KERNAN. Section 5 covers both points of section 7.

Mr. BAYARD. Then the whole of this section is unnecessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurrence of the Senate with the action of the Committee of the Whole in inserting section 7.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, as the bill is amended, it seems to me that it is a very dangerous bill. I am in favor of refunding the public debt as rapidly as possible and under the most advantageous terms to the Government; but I do not believe with the fifth section retained that we shall be likely to refund the national debt without creating a great deal of confusion in business circles. I only want to say that as this bill has been thus amended since it came from the committee, or rather as the Senate has refused to concur in the amendments of the committee, I propose to vote against the whole bill.

Mr. BAYARD. On line 18, section 1, I move to insert the words "and one-half" after the word "three;" so that it shall read "shall bear interest at the rate of three and one-half per cent. per annum." On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. BUTLER. I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] I should vote in favor of the amendment if he were here.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 37; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,
Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Hoar,	Platt,
Baldwin,	Dawes,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Ferry,	Kirkwood,	Whyte,
Blair,	Groome,	Logan,	Windom.
Burnside,	Hamlin,	McMillan,
Cameron of Pa.	Hampton,	Morrill,

NAYS—37.

Bailey,	Grover,	Maxey,	Vance,
Beck,	Harris,	Morgan,	Vest,
Booth,	Hereford,	Pendleton,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,	Walker,
Call,	Ingalls,	Pugh,	Wallace,
Cockrell,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,	Williams,
Coke,	Jonas,	Saunders,	Withers.
Eaton,	Lamar,	Slater,
Farley,	McDonald,	Teller,
Garland,	McPherson,	Thurman,

ABSENT—13.

Blaine,	Conkling,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon.
Bruce,	Davis of W. Va.,	Kellogg,
Butler,	Edmunds,	Randolph,
Carpenter,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I now move, in line 10 of section 2, to strike out the word "maturity" and insert the word "redeemability;" so as to read:

And on the bonds so redeemed the Secretary of the Treasury may allow to the holders the difference between the interest on such bonds from the date of exchange to the time of their redeemability, and the interest for a like period on the bonds or Treasury notes issued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Under that amendment, the bonds being redeemable at the end of five years if the calling was five years afterward the difference of interest might have to be allowed for the whole time. The "maturity" I think that the bill and the committee have in view, means the time when the bond does mature, and it matures when it is called for.

Mr. PLUMB. But if the Senator will allow me, at line 5 he will find that these bonds are "uncalled," and consequently no date of maturity is fixed.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the maturity of the bond is when it is payable, and by its terms it is redeemable at the option of the Government at a certain date. Therefore the maturity is that which the Government chooses to make the maturity by calling it in and paying it off. I think the Senator will find that the same objection was made by the Senator from Georgia, who thought there might be some obscurity in the phraseology of the bill, and I think on reflection the Senator will see that the word "maturity" has a well-ascertained and defined meaning here. It is that which the term of the bond creates itself and that is the option of the Government by calling it in.

Mr. PLUMB. If any transaction under this section should take place after the first day of next July, what would be the effect of the provision here authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the interest on the bonds from the date of exchange to the time of their maturity? Would it relate back? If then the transaction is to take place before the first day of next July and these bonds are not called, there is no date of maturity at all, because it is the call that makes the maturity. Of course I do not assume that the Secretary of the Treasury might not construe this as the Senator from Delaware does, but it looks to me to be entirely uncertain, to say the least.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.]

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be ordered to a third reading?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. RANSOM.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—43.

Bailey,	Farley,	Kernan,	Slater,
Bayard,	Garland,	Lamar,	Thurman,
Beck,	Groome,	McDonald,	Vance,
Booth,	Grover,	McPherson,	Vest,
Brown,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker,
Call,	Hereford,	Pendleton,	Wallace,
Cockrell,	Hill of Georgia,	Plumb,	Whyte,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Pugh,	Williams,
Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Saulsbury,	Withers.
Eaton,	Jonas,	Saunders,

NAYS—20.

Allison,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hoar,	Paddock,
Anthony,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Platt,
Baldwin,	Ferry,	Logan,	Rollins,
Blair,	Hamlin,	McMillan,	Teller,
Burnside,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,	Windom.

ABSENT—13.

Blaine,	Conkling,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon.
Bruce,	Davis of W. Va.,	Kellogg,
Cameron of Pa.,	Edmunds,	Randolph,
Carpenter,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,

So the bill was passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I report back from the Committee on Appropriations the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes. I am directed to report it back with sundry amendments; and I will say that I do this at the request of the chairman of the committee, who also desired that I should give notice that on Monday or Tuesday he will ask the Senate to consider the bill.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882.

On motion of Mr. BOOTH, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT appointed Mr. BOOTH, Mr. WITHERS, and Mr. ALLISON.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 7103) to constitute Atlanta, Georgia, a port of delivery, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. ALLISON, Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. BECK, Mr. BURNSIDE, Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin, Mr. COKE, Mr. FARLEY, Mr. FERRY, Mr. GARLAND, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. KERNAN, Mr. McDONALD, Mr. McMILLAN, Mr. PUGH, Mr. ROLLINS, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. SLATER, Mr. WALKER, and Mr. WITHERS submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin, submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COKE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It will be recollected that when the funding bill was taken up, what is called the cattle bill was the unfinished business and was under consideration. I recognized the importance of the funding bill and yielded to the Senator from Delaware to go on with the funding bill, but there was an understanding that on the completion of the funding bill the cattle bill should be resumed. I think there was an explicit understanding that when the funding bill was completed the cattle bill should be proceeded with. I consider that bill of so very great importance that I wish to urge its consideration on the Senate, and I will ask the Senate to take it up and proceed with its consideration at this time.

Mr. WITHERS. My motion is pending to proceed to the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill. It is not amendable by substituting any other bill for it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. But the other bill was the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WHYTE in the chair.) The Chair will state to the Senator from Virginia furthest from the Chair [Mr. JOHNSTON] that there was some understanding with regard to the cattle bill, but it does not hold its place as unfinished business on the Calendar. The motion of the Senator from Virginia nearest the Chair [Mr. WITHERS] is therefore in order to proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill named by him.

Mr. JOHNSTON. My understanding was that this bill should take its place immediately after the completion of the funding bill. I certainly understood what occurred in that way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The cattle bill was under consideration. The Senator from Delaware moved to take the funding bill up, and suggested that by the unanimous consent of the Senate the cattle bill be temporarily laid aside, with the understanding that its consideration should be resumed the moment the funding bill was through, and the Senate so agreed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the Chief Clerk that there was some general understanding to that effect.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It appears of record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not hold its place as unfinished business, but there was some general understanding to that effect. The Chair will therefore lay that bill before the Senate, and then the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] can move to lay it aside and proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question is on taking it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On taking up the appropriation bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I understand the decision of the Chair to be that the business now before the Senate is the consideration of the bill for the suppression of pleuro-pneumonia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By the understanding of the Senate that bill is before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. EATON. If I can get the eye of the Chair for a moment, I think I can settle this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rose to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont rises to a question of order, which takes precedence.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] to take up his appropriation bill is in order. I remember with some distinctness what was said about the cattle bill, and I believe that it was the understanding that it should be taken up, but it was stated at the time that those understandings never go upon the Journal, and it did not go upon the Journal as I believe; therefore the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] is in order and is the question before the Senate. I submit with great respect that the Chair has no right to lay before the Senate the cattle bill, although every one of us might vote and ought to vote to take it up when we come to act on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont having raised the question of order, the Chair agrees with him that it is not in order as a matter of mere general consent, and in the opposition of any member the cattle bill cannot be laid before the Senate. Therefore the question is on taking up the appropriation bill indicated by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. One moment, Mr. President. That involves just the solution of the question whether or not an understanding distinctly made and assented to by the Senate shall be carried out. That is all there is of it.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator shall not put me in the position of endeavoring to prevent the carrying out of an understanding made. I deny that there was such an understanding on my part.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then we must consult the RECORD in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must hold this discussion out of order. It is a matter for the Senate to decide for itself. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] to take up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Before that is decided I wish to have the RECORD read to the Senate to see what was agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think it ought to be——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The portion of the RECORD called for by the Senator from Iowa will be read.

Mr. PADDOCK. I was going to suggest that it did not seem to me to be necessary to do that because it ought to be within the memory of every Senator here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise to an explanation. I think there is no trouble on this matter. The Senators from Virginia misunderstand each other. The object of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] was merely to take up the cattle bill that it might have its place, and then to waive its present consideration to take up the appropriation bill, and with that understanding the other Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] has no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to such an understanding. I believe it is confusing, troublesome, and mischievous.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You consented to it the other day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I consented that the cattle bill might be taken up and I am going to vote to take it up against everything because I agreed to do it, whatever harm may come from it; but I do not mean to agree hereafter when I am here to lay anything aside informally to do something else, for it leads to difficulties of this kind continually.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. With the consent of the Senator, I will read what appears of record as to our proceeding. This occurred on February 15, as appears by the RECORD of the 16th:

> The PRESIDING OFFICER. The RECORD shows that the last bill under consideration yesterday was the pleuro-pneumonia bill. The funding bill was not called up and laid before the Senate prior to the adjournment as it should have been in order to make it the unfinished business. The Chair, therefore, decides that the pleuro-pneumonia bill is the unfinished business. If the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia is agreed to by the Senate, the Senator from New Jersey may proceed with his remarks.
> Mr. BAYARD. And the funding bill is now before the Senate?
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. The funding bill is before the Senate.
> Mr. PADDOCK. Do I understand that that leaves the pleuro-pneumonia bill in a situation to be called up at any time?
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, it leaves the pleuro-pneumonia bill as the unfinished business after the consideration of the funding bill shall have been concluded. The bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was perfectly true on that day, and if before the adjournment the cattle bill, as it is called, had been called up it would have been laid before the Senate; but it has been the law of this body ever since I have been here, which is a good while, that pending a bill, on an adjournment unless the bill that is laid aside is taken up it loses its place. Now, I think we are bound to carry out this understanding, and I shall vote to do so; but I want to stand by the regular course of the business and the law of the Senate in making the point I do; that is all.

Mr. HOAR. I now ask unanimous consent that the cattle bill be taken up and laid before the Senate as the pending business.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is right; that is according to the agreement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection on the part of any Senator to taking up the bill known as the pleuro-pneumonia cattle bill? The Chair hears no objection, and that bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. RANSOM. Now, Mr. President, I rise to a formal motion. I ask that House bill No. 7104, the river and harbor bill, be taken from the table, read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not a formal motion, Mr. President.

Mr. RANSOM. I thought it was.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There will be considerable question about the reference of that bill; it is so very good now that it may be a question whether we had not better pass it altogether, and I should like to be heard upon that point when the proper time comes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion cannot now be made.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that unanimous consent be given to lay aside the pleuro-pneumonia bill temporarily and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 7035.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pleuro-pneumonia bill is before the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. That being so, I move now that the pending order be postponed for the purpose of taking up the District appropriation bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Let the pleuro-pneumonia bill be reported to the Senate by the Clerk by its title.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill before the Senate will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (S. No. 2097) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry and for the suppression and prevention of contagious diseases among domestic animals."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take up the District appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia moves to lay aside the bill now before the Senate in order to proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no motion to lay aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To postpone informally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Nor to postpone informally.

Mr. WITHERS. In order that the point of order may be fully covered, my motion is to postpone until to-morrow the further consideration of the pleuro-pneumonia bill, my purpose being to supplement that, if it shall carry, with a motion to take up the bill making appropriations for the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I wish to say that as I understand it, and I am sure the RECORD of three or four days will bear me out, it was understood by general consent that after we had disposed of the funding bill we would consider this cattle bill. I wish to stand by that understanding and I shall vote against everything else until we consider it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to postpone the further consideration of the pending bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 30, noes 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia moves to take up the appropriation bill indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EATON. I have been trying for a long time to see if I could not settle the question by making another original motion. There is very important business in executive session, business perhaps that I ought not to speak of in an open session, important to the honor of more than one country. We are approaching the close of the session, and that business ought to be taken up. As the chairman of the committee having that matter in charge, I feel bound to-day to ask that the Senate go into executive session now for the purpose of considering a very important public matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS. I move that the formal reading of the appropriation bill be dispensed with, and that it be now read for amendment, and that amendments of the Committee on Appropriations be acted on as they are reached in order in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, that course will be pursued.

Mr. RANSOM. I would like now to renew the motion I made that the river and harbor bill be taken from the table for the purpose of being read the second time and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the bill indicated by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to its being laid before the Senate by unanimous consent for discussion and motions; but I respectfully submit that the Chair has no more right to lay that bill before the Senate than any other. It was read the first time yesterday and came over therefore on the Calendar with everything else to this day, to have its second reading moved, and then the question of reference; but I do not object on this present occasion to the bill being laid before the Senate, not displacing the appropriation bill. I merely make this remark in order that it shall not be drawn into a precedent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to its being read the second time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to its being read the second time. That is a question for discussion. I do not object to the Chair laying the bill before the Senate by general consent.

Mr. RANSOM. I move the second reading of the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I object. I desire to say to the Senator from North Carolina that my objection grows out of the fact that the Senator from Vermont indicates that he means to debate the question, and therefore it is simply laying aside the appropriation bill, which the Senate has just decided to consider, for a long time. If it did not interfere with this bill I should not object. I suppose the Senator from North Carolina did not understand the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me. I did understand the Senator from Vermont; but I understood the Senator from Vermont as simply insisting that I should conform to the rules of the Senate in making this motion; and now I desire a vote on whether the bill shall be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR. I will withdraw my objection, and let the Senator from Vermont take his own course.

The CHIEF CLERK. "A bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the reference that is proposed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to know by what rule the Chair can direct a bill to be read a second time without putting the question. I wish to vote against the second reading of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Vermont. The Chair will put the question. The question is, Shall this bill be read a second time?

The bill was ordered to a second reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read the second time.

The Chief Clerk read the bill the second time by its title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I understand the Senator from North Carolina to move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. RANSOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to add to that an instruction that the Committee on Commerce be directed to reduce the aggregate of the appropriations to a sum not exceeding $7,000,000.

Mr. HOAR. By what authority can the Senator from Vermont move to amend a motion which has not yet been either made or stated by the Chair?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Senator from North Carolina to make the motion to refer.

Mr. RANSOM. I had not actually made that motion. The Senator only anticipated me. Let us vote upon the reference.

Mr. HEREFORD. Upon a motion to refer a bill which has been read the second time, to a certain committee, is it in order to instruct the committee what they shall do upon that bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the Senate can instruct its committees in regard to any matter it may refer to them for inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair state the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont by way of instructions to the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the instructions that I move be reported from the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

With instructions to reduce the aggregate of appropriations to a sum not exceeding $7,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on this amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina to refer the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. I move that the Committee on Commerce be permitted to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. WITHERS. Before the Senate proceeds to consider the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations, I wish to make a few general remarks in regard to the provisions of this bill.

The amount of the estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia is	$3,352,000 00
The amount contained in the House bill as passed by that body is	3,417,334 44

The bill, therefore, as reported to the Senate makes an appropriation of	3,407,457 44

The amount to be paid by the United States under the bill as reported is one-half of the whole sum	1,703,728 72

SEC. 2. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 3 the following:

SEC. 3. That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to sell to the highest bidder, at public auction, the following-named property belonging to the said District of Columbia in Washington City: Lot 3, square 382; part of lot 3, square 490; and also the following-named property in the city of Georgetown belonging to said District: Fish-wharf on square 6; part of lots 47, 48, and 49 in square 30; and part of lot 245 in square 99: Provided, That if, in the opinion of said commissioners, the highest bid made at said sale for any or all of said lots is not a full and fair price for the same, the said commissioners shall have the right to reject such bid or bids and annul said sale or sales; and that the proceeds of the sale of the said lots situate in Washington shall be applied to the erection and furnishing of two new police station-houses in Washington; and the proceeds of the sale of the said lots situate in Georgetown, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to the purchase of a lot and the erection and furnishing of a new engine-house for engine company No. 5 of the District of Columbia fire department, at present located in said city of Georgetown.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to know from the Senator having this bill in charge the grounds upon which this provision for the sale of property in Washington City is incorporated in the bill. It involves no appropriation, I think.

Mr. WITHERS. It was an amendment moved by the Committee on the District of Columbia, and referred to the Appropriations Committee, the object being to dispose of certain portions of property in the city which are not now occupied, not taxed, and are the source of no revenue. The proposition receives the approval of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds, as also of the commissioners of the District of Columbia. The money received from the sale is designed to be appropriated, as the provisions of the section prescribe, in the erection of public buildings and an engine-house.

Mr. MCMILLAN. This matter was before the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which I have the honor to be a member, and at the time of its consideration it did not meet my approval.

Mr. ROLLINS. If the Senator from Minnesota will allow me a moment, I will say that this matter was before the Committee on the District of Columbia and at the request of the committee I visited personally all the lots that it is proposed to sell, and I am satisfied that the best interests of the District of Columbia would be complied with if they were sold. I have a statement here which is very brief and I will read it if any Senator desires further information with reference to it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I shall be glad to hear a statement of the description and location of the lots.

Mr. ROLLINS. I will give that for I have it all before me.

The first is lot 3, square 382, the central guard-house, situated between Ninth and Tenth streets on Louisiana avenue, just below the Centre Market. It has a front of 57 feet 9 inches on Louisiana avenue and 58 feet on B street. This property is assessed at $25,591. The house is in a dilapidated condition, and it cannot be used for what it was intended, being temporarily occupied as a night lodging-house. It yields no revenue to the city. I will say for the information of the Senate that on each side of this building are good, substantial brick houses, in which a large business is transacted. This property could now be sold at from $25,000 to $30,000; it yields nothing to the District to-day, and the District would then be receiving a revenue to be derived from taxation. I wish so say further that if that building is disposed of it is the purpose to erect a suitable station-house in that part of the city. If any Senator will visit the present station-house, located in that section of the city where it is proposed to build a new one, I think he will come back to this Chamber and vote with great alacrity for the sale of this property, if for no other purpose than to secure a decent and respectable station-house for the use of the city.

The next is part of lot 3, square 490, city spring, on the north side of C street northwest, near Four-and-a-half street. This is a very small lot fronting 37 feet 4 inches on C street, by a depth of 150 feet, and is assessed at $4,913. The spring was cut off by sewers several years ago, and the lot has been filled up. It brings no revenue, is not even taxable, and the District has no use for it. It is a small lot and really can be of no service to the city in its present condition, and it should be sold.

Lots 28 and 29, square 6, are in Georgetown, the fish-wharf, at the corner of Potomac and Water streets. They front seventy-seven and one-half feet on the Potomac River, are assessed at $1,800, and bring a mere nominal rent, less than $100. It is of no value to hold this property, as the cost of repairs exceeds the revenue from it.

Part of lot 47, square 30, is the Georgetown town-house, on the south side of Bridge street, near High street. It fronts forty-seven and one-half feet on Bridge street, and has a depth of ninety feet. It is assessed for the ground at $1,744, and for the house $3,000, making $4,744. This is an old building, in a very dilapidated condition, totally unfit for use, and of no service whatever to the District. The grade of the street has been changed in front of it so that it is practically of no earthly account in its present condition, and there can be no question about the propriety of the sale.

It is proposed also to sell part of lot 48, square 30, the engine-house, which is located nearly in the same section of Georgetown, on the west side of High street, south of Bridge street, fronting sixty-eight feet on High street and has a depth of eighty feet. The ground is assessed at $1,360, and the house at $500, making $1,860. The object in making the sale of these two pieces of property is that the engine-house may be located upon higher ground. The present location of the engine-house in Georgetown is upon the low ground, so that whenever there is an alarm of fire it is almost invariably necessary to make the horses start with the engine on an up grade. It is very desirable that the engine-house should be located on a higher grade, so that when there is an alarm of fire they may start upon a down grade. To the sale of the property that is proposed in the city of Georgetown there can certainly be no objection.

There is another small lot, the Georgetown city spring, part of lot 245, square 99. The spring dried up forty years ago. It was dedicated in Theo. Beall's second addition in 1875, and is located in Orchard alley. The ground is valued or assessed at $41.

I have made a very careful examination of these lots, and I am satisfied that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations should be adopted.

Mr. HARRIS. The property proposed to be sold is of no use to the government of the District of Columbia. It is not a source of revenue; while the buildings proposed to be erected with the proceeds of the sales of this property are designed to supply the place of buildings the District has to pay rent for year by rear. It is recommended by the commissioners, and is obviously necessary and proper, that these lots should be sold and the proceeds appropriated to the construction of these engine-houses and guard-houses that are absolutely necessary, objects for which we are paying rent day by day every year.

There can certainly be no objection to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 4. That the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, in charge of public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, be, and is hereby, authorized to sell and convey, by good and sufficient deed, to each of the owners of lot 1, square 184; lot 5, square 185; lots 5, 6, and 7, square 198; lot 12, square 199, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, such portion of the ground immediately adjoining the front of said lots, or either of them, as will make the angles at the four corners of Sixteenth and K Streets, northwest, right angles, upon payment into the Treasury of the United States by said owners, or each of them, of an amount for the number of feet in each lot so to be conveyed at the rate the same may be appraised by three disinterested freeholders resident of the city of Washington, to be selected and sworn to said Chief of Engineers impartially to appraise said real estate at the true value thereof in money; and upon said sale the owners of said lots, respectively, shall pay into the Treasury of the United States, for the erection of a high-school building in the city of Washington, one-third of said purchase-money, and the remainder thereof, with interest, in one year from the date of sale. No conveyance shall be made until all the purchase-money is paid: Provided, That said Chief of Engineers shall not sell or convey one portion or any part of said real estate unless all the same is sold and conveyed.

Mr. HARRIS. I call the attention of the Senator from Virginia in charge of the bill to line 17. The first word "to" should be changed to "by;" so as to read "to be selected and sworn by said Chief of Engineers."

Mr. WITHERS. That is right. We all agree to that correction.

Mr. HARRIS. It is evidently a clerical error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as a new section:

SEC. 5. That section 7 of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the joint stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington," approved March 2, 1867, which reads, "That the buildings and grounds, the rents and revenues of the same, and the stock issued to erect such buildings shall be forever exempt from taxation," is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the Committee on Appropriations have now been gone through with.

Mr. HARRIS. From line 635 to line 638, inclusive, I move to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That the annual estimates of the District of Columbia shall be transmitted to Congress with the regular annual estimates for expenses of the Government by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The organic act of 1878 provides that the commissioners of the District shall make their estimates for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia; they shall be submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury; he shall approve or disapprove, and return the estimates with his approval or disapproval to the commissioners. This provision is intended to modify that act so as to make it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to send the estimates direct to Congress. If so, the commissioners will have no official information; there will be no record in the office of the commissioners containing the action of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is proper that they should have the record not only of their own action in making the estimate but of the action of the Secretary of the Treasury in respect to those estimates, before the estimates are returned to Congress.

Under the law as it now stands the Secretary of the Treasury approves or disapproves the estimates of the commissioners of the District, returns them to the office of the commissioners, the commissioners note the action of the Secretary of the Treasury, and under the provisions of the act of 1878, forward the estimates with the action of the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress and Congress sits in judgment upon the disagreement, if there be a disagreement, between the commissioners and the Secretary of the Treasury.

The act of 1878 was very carefully considered in this respect, and I see no reason why it should be modified by this provision of the bill while I see many reasons why the clause should be stricken out. I therefore ask that the proviso be stricken out.

Mr. BECK. Why would it not do as well to add to it? The proviso reads:

That the annual estimates of the District of Columbia shall be transmitted to Congress with the regular annual estimate for expenses of the Government by the Secretary of the Treasury.

So far it seems to be all well, because the committees of Congress can at once act, under the distinct authority or direction given to the Secretary, upon the estimates in the preparations of bills.

I suggest to add after the words "Secretary of the Treasury," in line 638, "and he shall also furnish a copy of his action to the commissioners of the District;" so that they can have it as well, and present to the committees of Congress any objection they may find to whatever action the Secretary may have taken. I think the committees of Congress ought to have promptly on the first day of a session what the Secretary of the Treasury recommends, and that we ought not to be compelled to await the action of the commissioners of the District nor deal with them, because I know of no way in which we could compel them to act, and they might withhold the estimates a considerable time.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I have no objection to a substitute for this provision which shall require the commissioners of the District of Columbia to transmit the estimates to Congress at the beginning of each session of Congress or on any named day; but the point I make is that the Secretary of the Treasury should, when he has approved or disapproved the estimates of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, return those estimates with his action in respect to them to the office of the commissioners, so that the commissioners may with such reasons as they see proper submit to Congress any answer and any disagreement between the views of the Secretary of the Treasury and the views that they entertain, submitting with those estimates whatever opinions and reasons they have for their disagreement with the action of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The commissioners should have the action of the Secretary before them, and should transmit his action, with whatever reason they have for disagreeing to his recommendations, to Congress. I have no objection to fixing any day the Senator from Kentucky or the Committee on Appropriations may deem right and proper that those estimates shall be transmitted to Congress; but let them be transmitted by the commissioners.

Mr. BECK. We receive our official communications from the Secretary of the Treasury, and when the commissioners send their estimates to the Secretary and he revises them and changes them we ought promptly to have the benefit of his recommendations. He might be required at the same time to send back to the commissioners what he recommends, and they could also be required to send to us what they think ought to be done; and then having from the Secretary of the Treasury his views and having from the commissioners their views, the committees of Congress and Congress itself would be better able to consider which was right and which was wrong. But if we are not to have the action of the Secretary transmitted to us and his action is to go back to the commissioners and then they are to send us their views, modified or not modified as they see fit, we, it seems to me, would be deprived of the information we need and the views of the Secretary of the Treasury, when we might as well have both, and ought to have both, so that Congress may determine which was right and which was wrong.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kentucky will allow me, I think I can suggest an amendment that will meet his views. Instead of moving to strike out the whole proviso I modify my motion, and after the word "Congress," in line 637, I propose to strike out the word "with" and insert the words "by the commissioners of the District of Columbia at the same time that," and after "Government" to insert the words "are submitted;" so as to read:

That the annual estimates of the District of Columbia shall be transmitted to Congress by the commissioners of the District of Columbia at the same time that the regular annual estimates for expenses of the Government are submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BECK. That does not quite meet my view, because I desire to have the Secretary's estimate for the District of Columbia transmitted by him.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that under the organic act of 1878 the commissioners could not transmit their estimates to Congress until they had had the action of the Secretary of the Treasury upon them.

Mr. BECK. If the commissioners will give us the views of the Secretary and their own views as well, so that we shall have both before us, any amendment that does that will meet my view.

Mr. WITHERS. I suggest that the whole procedure is prescribed by the statute which I hold in my hand. I read at page 104 of the Statutes, from the act of 1878:

The Secretary of the Treasury shall carefully consider all estimates submitted to him as above provided, and shall approve, disapprove, or suggest such changes in the same, or any item thereof, as he may think the public interest demands; and after he shall have considered and passed upon such estimates submitted to him, he shall cause to be made a statement of the amount approved by him and the fund or purpose to which each item belongs, which statement shall be certified by him, and delivered, together with the estimates as originally submitted, to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall transmit the same to Congress.

Therefore, the amendment suggested by the Senator from Tennessee is in exact accordance, as I think, with the provisions of the general law on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 395, in the appropriations for the Metropolitan police, after the word "dollars," I move to insert "one clerk, $1,000."

Mr. WITHERS. I will only say with regard to the amendment now proposed that it was submitted to the Committee on Appropriations, but it not having been estimated for, the committee did not recommend its incorporation in the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Virginia is right; it was not estimated for; and the reason why it was not estimated for was because the commissioner who has specially in charge the police department happened to be ill at the time of making the estimates, and though the additional clerk was regarded and recognized by the commissioners as absolutely necessary, it was not estimated for; but the commissioners deem it absolutely necessary and recommend the amendment that I suggest; and in deference to their assurance that it is necessary, I offer the amendment.

Mr. WITHERS. Not having been estimated for, in accordance with the principle which controls the action of the Committee on Appropriations on such matters, we did not put it into the bill. In addition to that I will state that as there is an addition to the force provided for in the bill we supposed they could get along for the next year without this additional clerk, and therefore we declined to incorporate it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. In line 420, after the word "dollars," I move to insert:

For the purchase of a steam-launch to facilitate the enforcement of the laws for the protection of game and fish, and for other river duty, $2,000; and for the equipment and operation of the same, $1,000.

Mr. WITHERS. So many of these amendments are coming in that I shall have to resort to the point of order which I raise upon this amendment, that it is neither included in the estimates nor recommended by a standing committee.

Mr. HARRIS. But it was offered in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Appropriations one day before it is now presented.

Mr. WITHERS. That does not bring it within the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The question, then, will be submitted by the Chair to the Senate, Is the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee in order? As many as are of opinion that the amendment is in order will make it known by saying "ay;" the contrary opinion "no." [Putting the question.] The "noes" appear to have it. The "noes" have it; and the amendment is not in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Referring to the subject of school expenses, I have just found on my desk a letter from a highly respected gentleman of this town, in which he calls attention to the fact, as he understands it to be, of the unnecessary expense hitherto incurred, last year at least, in repairs to school-houses and so on, and proposes a certain amendment. He says that:

Under the old system, which the amendment will restore, all ordinary repairs were made under the direction of the school trustees by a carpenter called a mechanical janitor. He was paid $1,200 a year, and he furnished his own horse, wagon, and attendant. When the superintendent or a trustee discovered that any repairs were needed, word was sent to the mechanical janitor, who took his tools and supplies in his wagon, went to the school-house, saw what was needed, and then and there made the repairs. There was but one trip and one job. It was expeditious and economical. The District got its repairs at first cost without middle men or surplus inspectors. But the present commissioners have changed all this by obtaining authority in the appropriation bill of last year, or year before, to substitute an inspector of buildings for the mechanical janitor, and they then gave the work to the inspector of buildings. He placed the business in charge of a subordinate, whom he pays out of the school-repair fund the same amount for superintending the repairs that the school trustees paid their carpenter for making them. That is, the inspector of buildings pays Mr. Henderson $1,200 a year out of the repair fund to oversee the work. The school board paid Mr. Lovelace (their carpenter) $1,200 for doing the work, he furnishing his own horse, wagon, and attendant. It is not strange, therefore, that the repair fund is now entirely used up before the year is but little more than half gone. More will be called for in the deficiency bill. Under the old system the trustees managed to keep within their appropriation.

The excuse put forth for the present system, the commissioners' system, is that all work is now done by the lowest bidder. The inspector of buildings' subordinate, when notified that repairs are needed, goes and makes a list of what is wanted and then asks for bids to do the work. It has turned out in practice that two or three men get all the jobs. Nobody else bids. The majority of carpenters cannot afford to follow up these odd jobs, and those who do, get their own prices. I am told that all, or very nearly all, the mason work for the past year has been given to a near relative of the inspector. There is too much red tape in this system of making the minor repairs to school-houses. It takes too long and costs too much.

Mr. WITHERS. From whom is that letter? Will the Senator please to state?

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I found this on my desk, which appears to be a personal letter to me, I do not think it consistent with courtesy to the gentleman to state his name.

Mr. WITHERS. I only wished to know whether it is an official communication from anybody.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not an official communication, but it is from a gentleman whom I know by reputation as highly respectable and acquainted with the subject.

Mr. WITHERS. I do not desire of course to press the inquiry. I only wished to inquire whether it is an official communication.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I dare say this gentleman would be quite willing that his name should be read, but acting as I know the Senator from Virginia would, I do not think it is right to read it at this moment.

I propose to put in at page 22, line 529:

For one mechanical janitor, horse, wagon, and attendant, $1,200; and all ordinary repairs to school buildings and furniture shall be made and supervised by said janitor under the board of school trustees.

But I see here in another place that is an appropriate enough place for it to come in if it were to come in at all, this provision on page 22 of this bill:

Provided, That the janitors of the principal school buildings, in addition to their other duties, shall do all minor repairs to buildings and furniture, glazing, fixing seats and desks, and shall be selected with reference to their qualifications to perform this work.

Whether that meets the point that this gentleman makes, I am not sufficiently familiar with the subject to have an opinion about; but if what he states is true that under the former way of doing it $1,200 appropriation for repairs was found sufficient for their method and that under the appropriation of last year or the year before or both $1,200 has been paid to an inspector to employ somebody to do it, that ought to be corrected. Perhaps the member of the committee in charge of the bill can tell me whether there is in this bill any place where for public schools there is a superintendent of repairs or any such officer provided for.

Mr. WITHERS. None.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If not, then this bill appears to have been framed on the theory of going back to the old way.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state that this matter is one which has been fought out before the Appropriations Committee for two or three years past, and the effort was abandoned this year, and I supposed would no longer be made. There was a contest for two years at least over the question of dispensing with the mechanical janitor, and the present provision of the bill is the same as the one of last year; and the information laid before us then and now by the commissioners is that the operations of this system have been found much more effectual and in every way desirable than under the former one, and more economical as well. At present the provision which the Senator has just read is found to operate very well in an economical point of view, inasmuch as the janitors are selected with regard to their faculty for making these minor repairs, and they are consequently made without any additional expense except for material.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I understand from this gentleman that in point of fact the existing appropriation of the preceding year for repairs has already been exhausted and that $1,200 a year has been paid to somebody for superintending repairs. If that is so, it appears to me that it is not right because these small repairs certainly could be made without employing a man at $1,200 a year to merely manage the repairing business, not to do it.

Mr. WITHERS. I will merely say that no such information was laid before the Committee on Appropriations. Of course, I have no knowledge from any facts beyond those communicated to me as a member of that committee; but I remember that this whole subject was thoroughly discussed at least two years ago, and the Committee on Appropriations determined to make the present arrangement, which has worked, as I understand, very satisfactorily since it has been in operation. We did not propose, therefore, to make any change.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand, then, from the Senator from Virginia, in charge of the bill, that there is no clause in this bill which provides for the employment of a superintendent of repairs or any title of that kind. Am I right in that?

Mr. WITHERS. So far as my knowledge extends I do not remember any such provision.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that be so——

Mr. WITHERS. I will state to the Senator that in line 286 there is a provision made "for inspector of buildings' office," which is in connection with the schools and immediately under the general contingent expenses of the Government. That inspector has a salary of $2,400, and his duties are much more extensive than those which the Senator has indicated through his correspondent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That cannot be the officer referred to in this letter that I have.

Mr. WITHERS. This inspector of public buildings embraces of course in his supervision the school buildings as well as all others.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, yes; but that is not the person referred to here, because this statement is—and I believe it prima facie, because the gentleman is highly respectable—that during the last year or the year before $1,200 of the public money has been paid to somebody for superintending these little repairs to school-houses, not superintending the construction of new ones, &c., and that was all the money that it cost before for doing the repairs and that he has employed carpenters besides, and that therefore the expense has run up and a deficiency has been produced. But I do not see myself, so far as I now understand the bill, that the proviso on page 22 does not cover the point to which this gentleman refers, and therefore I will with my present information make no motion about it.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is one thing that I wish to say, not in order to bring in an amendment at this time, but for the future. There is a provision in this bill, just like its predecessors for a great many years, for contributions to a large number of what I have no doubt are worthy private charities, and I propose to vote for them, and not to move to strike them out; but I wish to say that I do not believe in this method of exerting public charity. I believe that Congress legislating for the District of Columbia ought to provide its own agencies for the poor and the destitute and the sick by a suitable public provision of public hospitals and so on that shall be absolutely under public control and supported at the public expense just as in all the States there are and just as there ought to be. It has been found in several of the States where this method in this bill has been resorted to, notably in the State of New York, that in the end it runs into great mischief, contentions between seets, and ten thousand things that I need not take up the time of the Senate to refer to. I only call attention to the matter now in order that Senators may think of it, and in the hope that at the next session of Congress we shall be able to provide for the poor and the needy and the destitute by independent means, and stop this mischievous, as I think it is, method of legislation; and when I say "mischievous" I do not intend to reflect, far from it, upon any one of the institutions that are here mentioned, but public charity should be distributed through public channels and under public control, and sufficient provisions ought to be made for it. As long as there is not, probably this is the best we can do.

Mr. WITHERS. I concur very fully in the theoretical views of the Senator from Vermont. I will say, though, that the Committee on Appropriations, as he has intimated, found that certain charities are now in successful operation, and are furnishing the only means by which a great many public necessities are relieved, and we simply appropriated for them in that way. There has been a proposition brought before us, which I think will commend itself to the favorable consideration of Congress, for the establishment of a general hospital here, which I regard as an exceedingly important and desirable measure; but the Committee on Appropriations did not think it advisable to incorporate it in this bill. That there is necessity for such an institution here I regard as absolutely proved by the statements made before us, and I shall be very glad to see one established by law.

Mr. BECK. I served on the sub-committee with the Senator from Virginia, and I only rise to assure the Senator from Vermont that the representations of the physicians and of intelligent men here satisfy me that we ought to have a general hospital, and ought to have it as soon as possible, and that some well-selected site ought to be had, no matter what it costs, for Washington is worse provided for general hospital purposes than any city in America, so far as I am advised. If any proposition comes before us while I am a member of the Senate from the Committee on the District of Columbia, or any other committee for this purpose, it will be provided for if my vote can be effective.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Virginia did not understand me as intending the slightest reflection upon the Committee on Appropriations. Far from it.

Mr. BECK. Oh, no.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only thought it right to call attention to the theory involved in these appropriations to institutions of that kind.

Mr. BECK. I indorse every word the Senator from Vermont said, and regret that we are not able now to give the subject the consideration necessary to provide for the case properly.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

UNION RAILROAD DEPOT IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. WHYTE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3047) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to recommend a proper site for a Union railroad depot in the city of Washington, and for other purposes, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: In line 14, after the word "and," strike out "eighty" and in lieu thereof insert "eighty-one;" and that the Senate agree to the same.

WM. PINKNEY WHYTE,
R. E. WITHERS,
E. H ROLLINS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
WARNER MILLER,
EPPA HUNTON,
GEO. C. HAZELTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WHYTE. I move to proceed to the consideration of this conference report.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report is before the Senate.

The report was concurred in.

WILLIAM R. WILMER.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask the Senate to indulge me by allowing me to call up the bill (H. R. No. 301) for the relief of William R. Wilmer. I move to take it up.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. WHYTE. It will not take three minutes.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Another Senator will want three minutes, and another three minutes, and so on; and thus the matter we have been trying so long to get up—the cattle bill—will be postponed. I am satisfied we are doing a great public wrong in not considering the cattle bill. Believing as I do that the section of the country in which I live is in danger of suffering great wrong, I cannot, in view of my duty to the people among whom I live, consent to have that measure displaced.

Mr. WHYTE. Let the question be put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The question being put, a division was called for; which resulted—ayes 20, noes 5; no quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed to call the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suggest that we take the yeas and nays on the motion, and that will develop whether we have a quorum or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the call for the yeas and nays sustained?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I think there is no necessity for antagonism here.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will this bill give rise to debate?

Mr. WHYTE. Not the slightest.

Mr. PADDOCK. I think we ought to allow the Senator from Maryland to have his opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Allison,	Bruce,	Groome,	Pugh,
Anthony,	Burnside,	Harris,	Rollins,

Ferry,	Jonas,	Platt,	Wallace.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury in adjusting the accounts of William R. Wilmer, late collector of internal revenue of the fifth district of Maryland, to credit him with $1,813.54, being the amount in value of internal-revenue stamps and cash of which the safe in his office was robbed by burglars on the night of the 27th of April, 1875, and which have not been recovered. It is to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary that Wilmer was robbed without any collusion or privity on his part.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that there is no report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What committee reported the bill?

Mr. WHYTE. The Finance Committee.

Mr. ALLISON. This whole question is in a nutshell. This gentleman was collector of the fifth district of Maryland and had his office at the Relay House in a rather insecure building, but it was a building occupied by his predecessor and he was directed to occupy it. One night about one o'clock the whole building, safe, and everything in it, was blown open and its full contents taken away, amounting to about nine thousand dollars in money and revenue-stamps of various kinds. The robbers were pursued by this collector and everything recovered except about eighteen hundred dollars. The testimony shows that it was no fault of the collector in any way. He only asks to have that sum refunded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the testimony in regard to the fact that so many thousand dollars' worth of stamps was in the safe at the time the robbers carried it off?

Mr. ALLISON. The evidence shows that these items were in the safe at the time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Including the stamps?

Mr. ALLISON. Including the stamps, and some six thousand dollars or seven thousand dollars of stamps and funds were recovered afterward by this collector pursuing the robbers to New York.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do the books of the collector show that he had that amount of stamps on hand at that time?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir. There is no question about the fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that the committee are satisfied that his accounts were all right and that the stamps that are to be allowed for were actually stolen from him?

Mr. ALLISON. There is no doubt whatever about the facts of the case. The committee made the report unanimously.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TO-NIGHT'S SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS and Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I yield to my friend from Kentucky if he is going to move the cattle bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am. That is what I rise for. I move to take up the pleuro-pneumonia cattle bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 2097) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and for the suppression and prevention of contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to excuse me from attendance at this evening's session, if an evening session is held, as I believe under the standing order, unless otherwise ordered, there is to be an evening session. I feel so unwell, having a very bad cold, besides other things, that I do not think it safe or prudent for me to come here this evening; and fearing that there might be a lack of a quorum and that absent Senators would be sent for, I take this opportunity to ask the Senate to excuse me from attending this evening, if there be an evening session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the request of the Senator from Vermont.

The request was granted.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Mr. WITHERS. That we shall do without a motion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. But there is a recess order. I move that the evening session of this evening be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair state that again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. That is precisely the standing order. That is not the motion the Senator desires to submit.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I modify my motion. I move that the evening session of this evening be omitted.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hope that will not be done. We have adopted the resolution for evening sessions. Let us have an evening session to-night and go on with the business on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the evening session, provided for by resolution formerly adopted, be dispensed with this evening.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 26, noes 20.

SWAMP LAND GRANTS.

Mr. WALKER. I desire to give notice that on Monday at the expiration of the morning hour I shall move to set aside the pending and all prior orders and ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 273) to extend the provisions of an act approved March 2, 1855, entitled "An act for the relief of purchasers and locators of swamp and overflowed lands, and for other purposes." I call the attention of Senators to the bill, and hope there will be no objection to taking it up at that time.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF ANIMALS.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I hope the Senate will allow the cattle bill to be proceeded with without further delay. I make no objection to the notice of the Senator from Arkansas, but I ask that the Senate proceed with the cattle bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill indicated by the Senator from Virginia, Senate bill No. 2097, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary will proceed and read the bill at the point where he left off at the previous reading.

The Secretary read the amendment reported by the select committee to strike out section 6 in the following words:

SEC. 6. That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall direct said chief of bureau, in connection with the National Board of Health and the commissioners provided for in this act, to superintend all measures for the suppression of infectious and contagious diseases of domesticated animals, and to draught such rules and regulations as they deem necessary for a speedy suppression of said diseases; and said rules and regulations shall be certified for acceptance to the executive authority of the State or Territory wherein said diseases prevail.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture, through said chief of bureau, in connection with the National Board of Health, to prepare such rules and regulations as they may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory; and whenever any State or Territory shall accept the same, then it shall be the further duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture, through the said chief of bureau, and the commissioners and agents authorized by this act, in connection with the National Board of Health, to assist in such State or Territory in the execution of such rules and regulations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 2, of section 7, after the word "of," to strike out "the" and insert "any;" and in line 5, of the same section, after the word "animals" to insert "or animals suspected of disease;" so as to make the clause read:

That when the Commissioner of Agriculture is notified by the executive of any State or Territory of the acceptance of said rules and regulation, such sum as may be deemed necessary for the purchase and slaughter of all diseased or infected animals, or animals suspected of disease, in the State or Territory in which the outbreak has occurred shall be awarded from the fund hereinafter appropriated for this purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 3, section 8, after the word "with" to strike out "a contagious" and insert "any such;" and in line 6, of the same section, after the word "animals" to insert "susceptible to said diseases;" so as to make the section read:

That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall report to the President of the United States whenever he finds any place therein is dangerously infected with any such disease among domestic animals; and that upon the official publication by the President of such report the removal or transportation of animals susceptible to said diseases from said place into another State, Territory, or District shall be unlawful, except in so far as such removals shall be made in accordance with the rules and regulations for which provision is made in section 6 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 3, section 9, after the word "dollars," to insert "to be immediately available;" and in line 6, after "Agriculture," to insert "who shall annually report to Congress his proceedings under this act, with an itemized account of expenditures;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That to meet the expenses that may be incurred in carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available, is hereby appropriated, out of any money remaining in the Treasury and not otherwise appropriated, to be disbursed under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, who shall annually report to Congress his proceedings under this act, with an itemized account of expenditures.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1, section 10, after "corporation," to strike out "having control over live animals affected with any contagious or infectious disease;" so as to make the clause read "that any person, company, or corporation who shall knowingly violate the provisions of this act," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. Will it be in order to offer a substitute for the bill pending the consideration of the committee's amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. We are nearly through the amendments of the committee, and the practice requires them to be finished first.

The next amendment was, in line 4, section 10, after the word "act," to strike out "and the rules and regulations made in pursuance thereof;" so as to make the clause read "who shall knowingly violate the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments proposed by the committee are disposed of.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to call the attention of the committee to section 2 of this bill to show them how unnecessary and inconsistent the word "transportation" is as used in the eleventh line of section 2. That section provides that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make a special investigation and shall report the result of that investigation, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall establish regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live stock as the result of said investigation may require. In section 3 they make provision for placing the question of transportation under the Commissioner of Agriculture, and therefore there is a conflict of authority between the Secretary of the Treasury and Commissioner of Agriculture with respect to that point. I would move to strike out the words "and transportation" after the word "exportation" in line 11 of section 2. I will propose afterward an amendment to section 3 which will make the language a little more precise and full.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey moves, in line 11, section 2, after the word "exportation," to strike out "and transportation."

Mr. PADDOCK. It strikes me that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is a very proper amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to make a single suggestion; but possibly I am wrong. The object of this is to protect cattle in transitu; it is to make rules and regulations by which healthy cattle at Chicago or Saint Louis or Cincinnati may be protected in their transportation to the seaboard. If cattle are allowed to be transported without some provision being made to prevent their coming in contact with infected ones, they may contract the disease between Chicago and the city of New York, which may not develop itself until they have crossed the ocean; and thereby one of the main purposes of the bill will be defeated, which is to give a clean bill of health, as clean as possible, to such animals as we desire to export or transport to foreign countries. That is my view.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not think the section is liable to the objection the Senator from New Jersey makes. There are two purposes. In the first place, the Commissioner of Agriculture, through the chief of this bureau, is to make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases along the dividing line between the United States and Canada; and, in the second place, along the several lines of transportation from all parts of the United States to the ports from which exports are made to European ports. Of course the transportation to which live stock is exposed is part of the exportation, and the right to regulate the exportation necessarily embraces the right to adopt such necessary rules as will secure proper transportation. Therefore I think the bill should stand as it is in this respect. The object is to prevent the transportation of diseased cattle as well as the exportation of diseased cattle; hence I think the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is not a proper one to be made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would say, in addition to what the Senator from Virginia has said on the subject of transportation, that it is well known among cattle men and among veterinary surgeons that the transportation of one diseased animal in a car will render that car unfit for the transportation of every one for weeks or months thereafter unless proper means are taken to disinfect it, and therefore the disinfection of the car by a veterinary surgeon under the orders of the Secretary of the Treasury may become quite as important as the examination of the cattle preparatory to their shipment to foreign countries. That is the object of that word "transportation" there, that rules and regulations may be provided for the carrying of cattle to the seaboard, not only healthy cattle themselves but to provide them means of transportation which may secure them in their transit from contact with animals having contagious diseases. That is the object. Without that the bill will come to naught because it appeared before the committee as it is in the history of the disease, that it may be communicated months after by the straw, by the litter in the stable; that it may be blown into the air by paper and circulated in that way, and the débris cattle leave in the car may be used afterward by infected cattle or cars so left may be used afterward to transport healthy cattle and produce this disease, which all the authorities say is one of the most highly contagious diseases which afflict cattle.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. We cannot possibly finish this bill to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the motion will not be agreed to.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 16, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senate is too thin to consider as important a bill as this. There is nothing to be gained by continuing here at the end of the week after the fatiguing session of last night. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 11, noes 25.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. There is no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A minority of the Senate can refuse to adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly they can, but there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is aware of that fact.

Mr. ALLISON. There will be when we get along a little further.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, I think the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey ought not to be adopted——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair announces to the Senator from Virginia that no business can be transacted until there is a quorum here; no motion can be made.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move a call of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and fifty-five Senators answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum being present, the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Alabama that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS. We were here until after eleven o'clock last night, in view of which fact, pending the motion of the Senator from Alabama, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Tennessee allow me to make a statement to the Senate?

Mr. HARRIS. For that purpose I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have a paper that I desire to present to the Senate in executive session touching promotions in the Army, and it is very important indeed to the War Department that the Senate should act upon it at once, and I am quite sure it will not take five minutes, probably not three minutes.

Mr. HARRIS. Being appealed to on several hands to withdraw the motion to adjourn because various gentlemen desire an executive session, I shall withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee withdraws the motion to adjourn, and the question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Alabama that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 18, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SOLDIERS' REUNION, MAINE, 1881.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate joint resolution No. 162 from the Speaker's table, and move that the same be put upon its passage. It is a resolution granting to the Secretary of War power to loan cannon, equipments, &c., for a soldiers' reunion to be held in Maine in 1881. A similar resolution to that passed in reference to the soldiers' reunion in the State of Nebraska recently.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which objections will be asked for.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to send from some convenient fort or arsenal, to be used at the soldiers' reunion to be held in Maine in 1881, such cannon, tents, muskets, and equipments as can be conveniently spared, the same to be returned after the holding of said reunion in like good condition as when received: Provided, That all transportation of said articles to and from the place of reunion to the fort or arsenal shall be without expense to the Government: Provided further, That the adjutant-general of the State of Maine or other proper accounting officer shall receipt for said articles in the name of said State, and that such of them as shall not be returned shall be charged to said State against its quota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and being read the third time, it was passed.

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Calendar and put upon its passage the bill which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House bill No. 7103, to constitute Atlanta, Georgia, a port of delivery.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Atlanta, in the State of Georgia, be, and is hereby, constituted a port of delivery; and that the privileges of immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise conferred by the act of June 10, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," be, and the same are hereby, extended to said port; and there shall be appointed a surveyor of customs to reside at said port, who shall receive a salary, to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, not exceeding $1,000 per annum.

The SPEAKER. This bill comes from the Committee on Ways and Means, and is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WARNER. Is it a unanimous report of that committee?

Mr. KELLEY. It is.

Mr. FELTON. This bill is unanimously reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. I hope there will be no objection to its immediate passage.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio demand the reading of the report?

Mr. WARNER. I do not demand the reading of the report; I simply asked if it was a unanimous report.

Mr. ACKLEN. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to allow an amendment to be added to this bill.

Mr. WARNER. I shall object to any amendments.

Mr. ACKLEN. I simply want to include Morgan City, Louisiana, in the bill, which comes under precisely the same conditions. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] I wish to say further, and I hope there will be no objection to this request, that in reference to Morgan City being established as a port of delivery there is a unanimous report from the Committee on Ways and Means. It is the same thing precisely as is sought to be accomplished by this bill, and I ask that the two measures be considered at the same time.

Mr. WARNER. If amendments are to be inserted in this bill, I shall object to its consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FELTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC LANDS FOR AGRICULTURAL SCHOOLS.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill No. 940 in relation to lands donated to the several States and Territories for the benefit of agricultural and mechanical colleges, and ask that the Committee on Education and Labor be discharged from the further consideration of the same and that it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections to its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate bill No. 940, an act to amend an act approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act to donate lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this bill was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor of the House, and the gentleman from California now asks that said committee be discharged from its further consideration and that the same be put upon its passage.

Mr. PAGE. I will state, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COX. I demand the regular order.

Mr. PAGE. This bill is unanimously reported by the Committee on Education and Labor of the House. All this bill does is to repeal the law which originally provided that this money should be invested in 5 per cent. bonds——

Mr. COX. I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. PAGE. And authorizes the money to be invested at a lower rate of interest than 5 per cent.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being insisted upon by the gentleman from New York, the Chair must recognize the demand.

Mr. BRIGGS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRIGGS. I wish to know if it is necessary for members, in order to obtain the recognition of the Chair, to assemble in the area in front of the Speaker's desk?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The gentleman from New Hampshire will take notice that the Chair has not recognized members immediately in front of the Chair. The gentleman from Georgia was recognized in his seat far back in the Hall.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLYMER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLYMER. At the close of the proceedings yesterday a motion to adjourn was made. Through your courtesy I was the occupant of the chair at the time and put the motion to the House. There seemed to be, in my judgment, a preponderating vote in favor of adjourning, and in the confusion incident to that order I declared the House adjourned. There are gentlemen around me who declare that when that proceeding was taking place a division was called for. I wish to state now to the House that I did not hear the demand for a division, or I should certainly have given an opportunity that it might have been determined in any way the House chose to determine the question. But, sir, I fear that I have, unintentionally of course, done injustice to the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, for which committee a night session had been arranged last night, and in order to relieve myself from any imputation or that committee from any embarrassment which may result from my ruling, I now ask unanimous consent of the House that at four and a half o'clock this afternoon it take a recess until seven and a half o'clock this evening, for the purpose of considering bills in regard to the District of Columbia, and for nothing else.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Make it eight o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LOWE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DUNNELL. What was the hour suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania for a recess?

Mr. CLYMER. Four-and-a-half o'clock.

Mr. LOWE. Mr. Speaker, I should be perfectly willing to pass a vote of confidence in the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I am opposed to night sessions.

The SPEAKER. The recess can be taken by a vote of a majority of the House, but a special assignment of business requires unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. We may take a recess at any time if the majority of the House shall so determine.

The SPEAKER. Unquestionably.

Mr. CLYMER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LOWE] withdraws his objection.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Chair rule that by unanimous consent a recess has been ordered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not so ruled. The Chair has stated that the House by a majority vote can take a recess.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That has not been done.

The SPEAKER. It has not. But the House could not make an assignment of special business except by unanimous consent, as that would involve a change of the rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would not object to a recess with a view to considering District of Columbia business; but I do object to any recess except for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] has objected.

JAMES M. BACON.

On motion of Mr. BROWNE, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 758) for the relief of James M. Bacon was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the morning hour of to-day be dispensed with.

The question being taken; there were—ayes 56, noes 41.

Mr. BLOUNT. It does not seem to be fully understood what will follow if the morning hour be dispensed with, and I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER. The hour under the new rule would follow.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not insist on further count.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the morning hour was not dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-seven minutes past eleven, and, this being Friday, committees will be called for reports of a private nature.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. As I understand, reports are confined to private bills.

The SPEAKER. They are.

JOHN W. GREGORY.

Mr. KELLEY, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 7204) for the relief of John W. Gregory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF CONTESTANTS IN ELECTION CASES.

Mr. LAPHAM. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, unanimously, to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 7176) to amend chapter 182 of the act approved March 2, 1879, entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes."

The bill relates exclusively to the claims of contestants in election cases.

The SPEAKER. From the title it appears to be a public bill.

Mr. LAPHAM. It is private in its nature. It simply modifies the act in the way I have stated.

The SPEAKER. But it modifies a public law.

Mr. LAPHAM. It does that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes the bill is not in order under this call.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DETROIT.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 7119) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a site and to enlarge the present Government building in the city of Detroit, Michigan, and for the purchase of a site and erection of Government building in said city.

The SPEAKER. That is a public bill.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I withdraw the report.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. COFFROTH, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with favorable recommendations, bills of the following titles; and they were severally referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed:

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1553) for the relief of Sarah E. Herrell, widow of the late John Herrel, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 535) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza Ely; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back, with adverse recommendations, the following bills and petitions; and the same were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 6271) granting a pension to John Cordova;

Mr. SAWYER, from the Committee on Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 299) for the relief of Joseph N. Lewis; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

EARNEST KUBISH.

Mr. SAWYER also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 6778) for the relief of Earnest Kubish; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

H. V. PHILPOTT.

Mr. SAWYER also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3514) for the relief of H. V. Philpott; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CLINTON G. COLGATE.

Mr. LINDSEY, from the Committee on War Claims, reported the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar:

Resolved, That the claim of Clinton G. Colgate, asking for compensation for the use by the United States of patent No. 6519, covering the use of wire or wires insulated by gutta percha, or its equivalent, for electrical purposes, be, and is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, under the provisions of section 1059 of the Revised Statutes.

W. W. STREETER.

Mr. LINDSEY also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 6835) for the relief of W. W. Streeter; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The call of committees was concluded.

Mr. ATKINS. I was not at my desk when the Committee on Appropriations was called; and I ask unanimous consent to report a resolution from that committee at this time.

There was no objection.

HON. EVARTS W. FARR.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back, with an amendment, the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas the Committee on Invalid Pensions desire to place upon its record its appreciation of the kindly qualities and faithful labors of their late member, Hon. Evarts W. Farr, of New Hampshire; and

Whereas its members wish to express their regret and sympathy to the country, the State of New Hampshire, and to the bereaved family of the deceased in a worthy and satisfactory manner: Therefore,

Resolved, That the House be requested to make the customary appropriation of the balance of the salary which would be due to him as a member of the Forty-sixth Congress; and that the next Congress, to which he was elected, be respectfully requested to make a similar appropriation of the salary which would have been due to him as a member of the Forty-seventh Congress.

The amendment recommended by the committee was to strike out the words "a similar appropriation of the salary" and insert in lieu thereof "an appropriation of $6,000 in lieu of the salary."

The question was upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. The resolution as referred to the Committee on Appropriations requested that committee to recommend to the next Congress that it appropriate to the family of Mr. Farr the full salary for the next Congress. The Committee on Appropriations decline to comply with that request, and propose to recommend to the next Congress to appropriate $6,000 in lieu of the entire salary for the full term of the Forty-seventh Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that was done by this House in the case of Mr. Schleicher, of Texas.

Mr. ATKINS. That was the only case where it has been done.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR REPORTS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I rise to a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will present it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back a resolution referred to them, together with a substitute therefor.

The SPEAKER. The resolution and the substitute will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed and bound in one volume 50,000 copies of the numbers issued by the State Department of reports from the consuls of the United States on the commerce, manufactures, &c., of their consular districts; 35,000 of which shall be for the use of members of the House of Representatives and 15,000 for the use of the Senate.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed at the Government Printing Office, under direction of the Secretary of State, 20,000 copies each of the three numbers thus far issued by the Department of State of reports from the consuls of the United States on the commerce, manufactures, &c., of their consular districts; 14,847 copies thereof for the use of the House and 5,153 for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ATKINS. Is it designed to have these volumes bound?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Not now. They are coming out serially, and we propose to have them published with paper covers.

Mr. ATKINS. An estimate was sent in from the State Department for an item in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill to provide for publishing these consular reports quarterly. Is this for that purpose?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. These reports come out once a month, and we propose that those now issued shall be put together in book form, with paper covers.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask my friend from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] if he considers this a privileged matter?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. We are reporting back a resolution which was referred to us by the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know that. But there are certain matters which the Committee on Printing have the privilege of reporting upon at any time. As I understand it, this is a matter relating to the consular service, and is not properly before the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ATKINS. It ought to have gone to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, it should have gone to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I do not think that because the Committee on Printing has the right to report at any time it is privileged to report any matter that happens to get before it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The House thought proper to refer this resolution to the Committee on Printing, as it concerns the character and number of documents to be printed. We have considered it, and now make a report upon it.

The SPEAKER. This is a matter which has been properly referred to the Committee on Printing. It relates to the printing of certain documents for distribution to members of the two Houses. The Chair thinks it comes within the scope of the rule.

Mr. ATKINS. May I ask the gentleman from Mississippi when this reference was made to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I do not know the date; the resolution will show.

Mr. ATKINS. Let the Clerk read it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair learns from the Clerk that this resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing on the 24th of January last.

Mr. McMILLIN. Allow me to ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether it has been customary heretofore to print these reports for distribution?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. This is a new field; but certainly reports of this nature which have been made to the House from time to time have been published, and that too upon the recommendation of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. ATKINS. Does this proceeding require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does not. The resolution has been properly referred to the Committee on Printing; and it relates to the printing of documents for the use of members of the two Houses of Congress. In the opinion of the Chair, it comes within the purview of the rule.

Mr. ATKINS. I would like to hear the rule read.

The Clerk read as follows:

All proposed legislation or orders touching printing shall be referred to the Joint Committee on Printing on the part of the House.—Rule XI, clause 45.

The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, namely: * * * The Committee on Printing, on all matters referred to them of printing for the use of the House or two Houses.—Rule XI, clause 47.

Mr. ATKINS. Does the Chair hold that the House can take action at any time on a report of the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. If it comes within the scope of the rule, and is a proposition to print for the use of the two Houses or either House. That has been the uniform practice.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Never deviated from at any time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee can raise the question of consideration.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. It may be proper that I should give a word of explanation. As will be remembered, Congress passed a law directing our various consuls and consular agents abroad to make these reports from time to time. Three reports have been made, one in November, one in December, and one in January. They are published under the authority of law; but the usual number—1,900—has been published. We propose now to publish an extra number of these reports in order that they may be circulated among the people. In my judgment, (it may be worth but little,) nothing more important and more valuable to the country than these reports has been published since I have been a member of Congress. We propose the publication of only 20,000 copies of each of the three reports. Certainly the resolution is in order as a privileged report.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it proposed to issue these reports in separate volumes, or all in one volume?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. We propose to publish them in pamphlet form just as they have come to us.

Mr. SPRINGER. Why not publish them in one volume? Will the gentleman allow me to make that motion as an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. AIKEN] who introduced the resolution in regard to the printing of these documents.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker, the original resolution which I had the honor to introduce proposed simply the publication of the first two numbers of these issues, with the idea that they were to make a bound volume. I am satisfied that every member on this floor who will make himself acquainted with the contents of these two issues must be satisfied that they should be circulated broadcast over the land. These reports contain more valuable information than any work issued by Congress that I have ever read—information for the people. As I have said, it was my purpose to have those two issues bound in one volume and distributed throughout the land. The Committee on Printing recommend that a third issue shall be included.

As I understand, the State Department proposes in future to issue once a month, or once a quarter, a continuation of these publications. The subject-matter of the two reports printed in 1880 does not relate necessarily to what may follow; hence I think they should be published in a separate volume. Therefore, I earnestly object to the recommendation of the committee that these reports should be again printed in the way in which they are so easily destroyed. They are now perishable in use, but if they were bound in one volume they would be a valuable addition to the library of any citizen of this country.

I hope the House, therefore, will not adopt the resolution of the Committee on Printing, but will take the original resolution; and, if in order, Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit to the Committee on Printing, with instructions to report the original resolution without amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi having control of the subject would be recognized to call the previons question. If that should be voted down, then the resolution would be open to amendment. If the substitute reported by the committee should be voted down, then that would necessarily bring up the original resolution.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I wish to make one further remark. These pamphlets are small and the Committee on Printing did not deem it wise, indeed they thought it extravagant, to take these small pamphlets and put them into a volume and bind them. If the work of binding is to be done at all, there are three of these pamphlets, and not two, as the original resolution provides for, to be included in one volume. If they are to be bound at all, Mr. Speaker, the committee did not think it to be wise or proper to do that binding now. Indeed, these three pamphlets now issued would not make a larger volume than the very small one which I now hold in my hand. We have therefore recommended, as the best thing to be done at this time, the publication of these issues for distribution in their present form. If they are to be put in book form and bound, that would necessarily compel a change in the index and in the stereotype plates and in other respects. You would find it to be almost impracticable while at the same time it would double the expense to put them into book form. They come out every month, and I see no reason why the question of binding should not for the present be deferred.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me for one moment?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKNER. I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi whether it would not be better to defer the question of binding until more of these publications come out. I have read them, to be sure, with great interest, but I think the next Congress will be time enough to provide for their binding. I move to lay the whole subject on the table. [Cries of "No!"]

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri that the question of binding be deferred to next Congress is in accordance with the view of the Committee on Printing. We thought it would be premature to undertake to bind them now.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope that will not be done. At the next session of Congress it will be like printing last year's almanac.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. If they are to be published in book form a new index will be required and a change in the stereotype plates. It would not do, for it would be entirely too costly to publish these pamphlets and bind them separately.

Mr. BUCKNER'S motion was not agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, these papers furnish most valuable information on questions of the greatest interest to the country. The Secretary of State has announced the publication of two or three sets of these reports. They furnish information in relation to our commercial interests abroad which ought to be in the hands of not only members of Congress but of the people generally. I would be glad to see the three numbers now issued put into one pamphlet and bound.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the House votes down the previous question I give notice I will then move that the three volumes now issued be bound in one volume in the style of the Agricultural Report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for that amendment?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. No, sir. If these reports are to be issued every month from year to year there will necessarily be much of the matter that will be of temporary importance, and therefore I think the question of binding is one not now to be acted upon, but should be deferred until the next session of Congress, when it can be properly done. I insist on my demand for the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 33.

Mr. AIKEN. I demand tellers. If the previous question is ordered, Mr. Speaker, will a motion to recommit with instructions be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will be.

Mr. COX. Is the question debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. COX. I should like to say something.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I hope the resolution will not be recommitted with instructions.

Mr. AIKEN. I withdraw the demand for tellers.

So the main question was ordered.

Mr. AIKEN. I now move to recommit with instructions to the committee to report back the original resolution without amendment.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. BRAGG. Is this debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that he can reach his purpose without a motion to recommit with instructions. The resolution is reported back from the Committee on Printing with a substitute. If that substitute be voted down it will necessarily bring before the House for action the original resolution.

Mr. AIKEN. If the House will give attention to this question, I am satisfied the majority will approve the original resolution.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The original resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed and bound in one volume 50,000 copies of the two numbers issued by the State Department of "Reports from the consuls of the United States on the commerce, manufactures, &c., of their consular districts;" 35,000 of which shall be for the use of the members of the House of Representatives and 15,000 for the use of the Senate.

Mr. AIKEN. That was the original resolution, which simply provided that two of these numbers sbould be bound and issued in one volume. Now there seems to be a desire on all sides that the three numbers shall be included in the one volume, and as I do not object to that myself I will accept the modification of the amendment to include the three in the one volume if there be no objection by the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposed modification of the original resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I ask a vote on the substitute proposed by the committee.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 67.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I ask the yeas and nays. [Cries of "No!" "No!" "Take a vote by tellers!"] I will withdraw in deference to the wish of the House the demand for the yeas and nays and ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, and Mr. AIKEN were appointed.

Mr. CAMP. Let the substitute reported by the committee for the original resolution be again read.

The substitute was again read.

Mr. KEIFER. Is there any doubt as to which three reports are contemplated to be bound in one volume?

Mr. AIKEN. The October, November, and January reports.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 86.

So the substitute was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the resolution originally introduced, with the modification just accepted by the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Did I understand the Chair to say that the substitute was adopted?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated that it was rejected. It has not been agreed to.

The question now recurs on the original resolution as modified.

The original resolution, as modified, was then agreed to.

Mr. AIKEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution, as modified, was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CATALOGUE OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask now for the reading of the next report from the committee, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 6905) to authorize the preparation of a catalogue of Government publications from 1870 to date, with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this does not come within the range of the rule.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. It was regularly referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. Yes, but it is not a subject on which the committee has a right to report at any time. It will be in order when the committee is called.

REPORTS OF UNITED STATES ENTOMOLOGICAL COMMISSION.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. There is another report from the committee, which I ask to be considered at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 387) authorizing the printing of 30,000 copies of the third report of the United States Entomological Commission, with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendments proposed by the committee will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in the sixth line the word "one," and in the seventh line the word "thousand," and insert in place thereof "nine hundred and seven;" and after the word "thousand," where it occurs the second time in line 7, to insert "one hundred and ninety-three," so that it will read, "20,907 copies for the use of the House, and 2,093 for the Interior Department."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments proposed by the committee. There being no demand for a separate vote, the amendments will be considered in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

MRS. LELIA E. M'CAULEY.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a request to the House, and it is this: that at this hour nothing else being in order but the consideration of private bills, this being the day set apart for that purpose, I ask by unanimous consent that the bill of the Senate No. 1728, a bill which has passed the Senate and is recommended by the House committee unanimously, granting a pension to the widow of Commodore McCauley, be taken up and passed. I hope there will be no objection to this request, as I desire to leave the House.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 1728) granting a pension to Mrs. Lelia E. McCauley.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Lelia E. McCauley, widow of the late Commodore Charles S. McCauley, United States Navy, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of the pension she now receives; this increase to date from and after the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and being read the third time, was passed.

Mr. STEPHENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent——

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BRIGHT. Then I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the gentleman's motion in a moment, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] having been recognized.

HOSPITAL AND BURIAL GROUNDS AT LEADVILLE.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. No. 6062, which passed the House unanimously some time ago, be taken up with a view to concurring in an amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which objections will be asked for.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 6062) donating certain lands in Lake County, State of Colorado, to the Veteran Union Association of Leadville, for hospital and burial purposes.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask that the Senate amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 2, after the word "Leadville," insert "its successors and assigns."

The SPEAKER. What recommendation does the gentleman from Colorado make?

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to move concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BELFORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] is recognized.

Mr. COFFROTH. I rise to move that the House proceed to the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up private bills in order to refer them to committees, or in the case of those that have been reported favorably by House committees to put them on their passage. It will not take long to dispose of the private bills on the Speaker's table.

Mr. COX. That will take up all the day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no volition, in recognizing the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as to whether this would take up a moment or an hour. The question is simply whether the motion is in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we ought to go to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, if the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table should prevail the Chair thinks that only private bills would be taken up in order.

Mr. ROBESON. If that motion prevails are bills on the Calendar cut off?

The SPEAKER. Of course.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to say if the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be voted down, and if the proposition to go to the Private Calendar be voted down, unless the gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] asks to take up the agricultural appropriation bill, I shall ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the sundry civil appropriation bill. We have now only two more weeks to complete our work.

Mr. COX. I renew the notice I gave yesterday that to-morrow at twelve o'clock I will call the previous question on the apportionment bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COFFROTH] moves that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table for the purpose of taking up private bills.

Mr. WHITE. Does that require unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It does not; it is a motion provided for in the rules.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to hear what the proposition was that was made on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations in regard to the sundry civil bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I stated if the several propositions to take up private business shall be voted down, unless the gentleman from New York asks a consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, I shall ask the House to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the sundry civil bill.

Mr. CONGER. I hope that will be done.

Mr. KEIFER. Has the sundry civil bill been printed?

Mr. BLOUNT. It has.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COFFROTH.]

Mr. COVERT. I desire to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The easiest way to do that is to vote down the motion.

Mr. COVERT. It is only fair to the House they should be informed before a vote shall be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the agricultural appropriation bill is ready and has been ready, for many days past, for consideration.

Mr. VALENTINE. Why did the gentleman not bring it up yesterday?

Mr. COVERT. I gave notice yesterday that the bill was ready and repeat that notice now.

Mr. COX. I ask the Chair to inform the House whether if we go to the Speaker's table we will not be compelled to take up every bill, public and private?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. But that point can be readily made by the Chair submitting the motion in the manner as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself, that the House proceed to business on the Speaker's table for the purpose only of considering private bills.

Mr. SPRINGER. On Friday, under the rule, if the House went to the Speaker's table, would not the consideration of private bills only be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that only private bills could be considered.

Mr. SPRINGER. And virtually there can be no consideration of private bills on the Speaker's table except by unanimous consent; because if a bill makes an appropriation of public money——

The SPEAKER. It is subject to the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. And one objection will take it to the Calendar. I think we can reach all the private bills on the Speaker's table and refer them in half an hour's time.

Mr. CONGER. I trust we may go on with the appropriation bills.

The question being taken on Mr. COFFROTH'S motion, it was not agreed to—ayes 22, noes not counted.

Mr. BRIGHT. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the Private Calendar.

Mr. COVERT. Am I at liberty to offer an amendment to that motion?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move to dispense with the consideration of private business, which can be done by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the House refuses to go into Committee of the Whole, would it not then be in order for the gentleman from New York to call up the appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read the two rules that relate to the business of Friday.

The Clerk read Rule XXIV, clause 6, as follows:

Business on the Speaker's table having been disposed of, it shall then be in order to entertain motions, in the following order, viz:

* * * * * * *

Third. On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and, if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

The Clerk also read Rule XXVI, as follows:

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair stated on a former occasion, these two rules are inconsistent. Rule XXVI provides that private business shall not be dispensed with except by a two-thirds vote; and yet Rule XXIV in its sixth clause provides that if the House refuses to proceed to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar then the House will proceed to the consideration of public business. The Chair, however, will recognize first any motion to dispense with the private business.

Mr. CONGER. I hope we may take the vote directly on the question to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The question being taken on Mr. BRIGHT'S motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar, there were—ayes 55, noes 100.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the effect of the vote just taken is to leave the House free to consider public business to-day.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of business on the House Calendar. I do this with a view——

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Does it not take a two-thirds vote to dispense with the business assigned by the rules for this day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again cause to be read clause 6 of Rule XXIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

Business on the Speaker's table having been disposed of, it shall then be in order to entertain motions, in the following order, viz:

* * * * * * *

Third. On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and, if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

The SPEAKER. The discrepancy between this rule and Rule XXVI is not in consequence of any action of the Committee on Rules; but it comes about in consequence of an amendment of Rule XXVI, which was made by the House to the rule as reported from the Committee on Rules, the amendment being to require a two-thirds vote to dispense with private business on Fridays. On a former occasion the Chair stated that he had no power to compel the House to proceed to the consideration of private business on Friday if a majority of the House should refuse to do so.

Mr. SPRINGER. The House having refused to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, are not bills of a private nature pending before the House, and which have been reported from the Committee of the Whole, in order to be now considered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware that there are any such.

Mr. SPRINGER. There may not be, and, if not, then public business would be in order.

Mr. BRAGG. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRAGG. The rules require a two-thirds vote in order to dispense with the consideration of private business on Fridays. The House having refused to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, that does not dispense with the rule governing private business to-day, because there is private business which is not on the Private Calendar. It seems to me that under a proper construction of the rule such private business, not on the Private Calendar, should now have preference before public business, as there has been no two-thirds vote to dispense with private business for to-day. That being so, those who are interested in private bills on the House Calendar, which is different from the Private Calendar, it seems to me, under the rules, ought to be entitled to preference in order of business.

The SPEAKER. The House has refused to proceed to the consideration of private business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. BRAGG. That is so.

The SPEAKER. And the House also has refused to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BRAGG. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman maintains that the next motion to be recognized is a motion to proceed to the consideration of private business on the House Calendar.

Mr. BRAGG. That is my point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would entertain such a motion.

Mr. CONGER. I would like to understand what is the record of the motion upon which the House has just acted. I understand that the motion just voted down was to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of private business, not private bills and not the Private Calendar; which motion would include, I think, the House Calendar as well as the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. There are three calendars—the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the Private Calendar, and the House Calendar. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] maintains that although the House has refused to consider the private business on the Speaker's table and has refused to go into Committee of the Whole to consider the Private Calendar, the next motion in order is the one to proceed to the consideration of private business on the House Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. If the motion just voted down expressly stated "Private Calendar," then the Chair is right.

The SPEAKER. That was the motion; to go into Committee of the Whole to consider business on the Private Calendar. That motion was voted down, and the Chair thinks that he is now bound to recognize a motion to consider private business to-day wherever it may be, other than on the Private Calendar and on the Speaker's table, motions to that effect having been voted down.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it in order to move to dispense with private business for to-day?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order, but it would require a two-thirds vote to be successful. The motion to proceed to private business on the House Calendar can be decided by a majority vote, as were the two other motions.

Mr. SPARKS. I desire to state that my object in making this motion is to reach the bill on the House Calendar for the relief of General Porter.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. SPARKS; and upon a division there were—ayes 63, noes 94.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. SPARKS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPARKS, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois, were appointed.

Mr. SPARKS. I want to state to the House that I do not propose to take any considerable time on the bill. It has been pending here since the beginning of this session, and it is expected that we can get through with it in one hour.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. You cannot get through with it in a week.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 78, noes 108.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. SPARKS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being 45 in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of the last vote.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 117, not voting 61; as follows:

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, said: In deference to the wishes of friends, I change my vote from "no" to "ay."

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. MITCHELL, on this vote. Mr. BLACKBURN would vote "ay;" Mr. MITCHELL, if present, would vote "no."

Mr. CABELL with Mr. BLAKE.

Mr. O'CONNOR with Mr. BREWER, on all political questions, for to-day.

Mr. ROSS with Mr. FISHER, on this question.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. RUSSELL of Massachusetts, until further notice.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS with Mr. EWING, indefinitely.

Mr. ROBESON with Mr. MCKENZIE.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. JOYCE.

Mr. VAN AERNAM with Mr. HENRY.

Mr. BAYNE with Mr. FROST, on political questions.

Mr. WARD. I am paired with the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. KENNA,] who is engaged in his duties on the Committee on Enrolled Bills. I have voted on this question because I have learned that the gentleman from West Virginia would, if present, vote on the same side.

Mr. ACKLEN. Mr. Speaker, I change my vote from "no" to "ay." I do this after an assurance from the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SPARKS] that if the previous question is not sustained at the close of one hour, he will withdraw the measure. I think we should go on with the appropriation bills and other public business, and not waste the few remaining days of the session in a partly political discussion.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the reading of the names be dispensed with.

Mr. BRAGG. I object.

The names having been read, the result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for a division on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. KEIFER. I withdraw my motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 178) authorizing certain books and mementoes in the possession of the Government to be placed in the Memorial Hall of the National Lincoln Monument at Springfield, Illinois.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1710) for the relief of William H. Gill; and

A bill (S. No. 2178) to authorize the construction of a fire-proof building at Columbus, Ohio.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COVERT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, would not a proposition to limit debate on this bill be in order now?

The SPEAKER. It would not, as the Committee of the Whole has not yet entered upon the consideration of the bill.

The motion of Mr. COVERT was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. COVERT. I ask that the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, that will be ordered.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless some gentleman desires to occupy the floor in general debate, the bill will now be read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. All questions of order were reserved when the bill was introduced.

The CHAIRMAN. They were.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. Chairman, before we proceed to the consideration of the pending bill by paragraphs, I desire to explain, in a general way, some of its leading features. And if I may be permitted, I beg to call the attention of the House—partly because of some of the provisions contained in this bill, and partly because of some statements made in the discussion the other day relative to the making the Department of Agriculture an executive branch of the Government—to the original design of the Department, the specific objects sought to be accomplished by its creation.

We had an immense area of land under improvement, and a still larger extent of territory lying waste and uncultivated. Different characters of climate and soil demanded entirely different methods of treatment. Individuals and separate communities were slowly experimenting to determine what might be best adapted to these various conditions. I hazard nothing, sir, in saying that it was not because of any express or even implied warrant or grant in the Constitution, but because of the seeming necessities of the case, that the Department of Agriculture had its origin. It was because it was thought that Government could make experiments and apply tests in the directions indicated better and more profitably than individual citizens or individual communities. The sole idea involved was that this Department should be an experimental Department, and that the results of its work should be diffused among the people, to be utilized by the large class of our own citizens engaged in agriculture.

Nowhere, sir, is this idea more clearly made apparent than in the section of the original act defining the duties of the Commissioner in respect to the purchase, growth, and distribution of seeds. The section provides that he shall collect new and valuable seeds and plants; shall test the same by cultivation, and that he shall then distribute them among agriculturists. I call the special attention of the House to the phraseology employed here. The seeds are not to be distributed generally, but only to a certain special class of our citizens, who are required to make further tests, to ascertain if particular seeds are adapted to certain peculiarities of soil and climate, and to report the facts ascertained to the Department for general promulgation to the people.

The committee endeavored last year, when they reported their appropriation bill to the House, to conform closely to this provision of the statute. An amendment prevailed, however, upon the floor, which changed the language of the organic act, and directed that three-fourths of these seeds should be sent by the Commissioner of Agriculture to the various Senators and Members for distribution by them among their constituents, and that only the remaining one-quarter should be distributed by the Commissioner. This, as might have been expected, and as was urged at the time of the adoption of the amendment, has given rise to a world of trouble and confusion. The Commissioner of Agriculture has been obliged to open accounts with over three hundred Senators and Members in the same way that a bank account is kept, and every individual order received, sent by a Senator or Member, has been necessarily entered under an individual heading in the accounts of the Department.

Under the former system the Commissioner sent our yearly to people upon whom he could rely, to men whom he knew to be practical and intelligent farmers, these seeds and plants for experimental purposes. He was in receipt regularly from these correspondents of information as to the success or non-success of the experiments made. The adaptability of various seeds to certain conditions of soil and climate thus became known, and this information was given to the public through the reports of the Commissioner. This was in accordance with the design of the original act establishing the Department.

It is safe to say that of the seeds sent out under the present method of distribution not one recipient of them in one thousand ever thinks of making any report as to the results reached. Not only, Mr. Chairman, in this particular has the present method worked trouble and confusion, but its ill effects have been exhibited in other particulars. Seeds that were intended especially for northern latitudes, grains which could only flourish and grow there, have been sent to the South, while cotton seeds and plants of various kinds adapted only to southern latitudes have been sent to the North, where neither the decrees of Heaven intended these seeds to grow nor the ingenuity of man could make them flourish. The average constituent who received these seeds intended for other latitudes, finding they never came up, criticised and found fault with this Department because of these unfavorable results.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this committee have again enacted or sought to have enacted in the bill which they have introduced a clause relegating the matter of seed distribution to the Commissioner. They have gone back to the organic law and given the Commissioner of Agriculture full power and discretion in this matter of distribution. The Commissioner has made every effort to conform to the law, but Congress has taken from him the power sought to be conferred by the section of the original act I have mentioned. Bound hand and foot by the amendments adopted by Congress, he has been almost powerless to carry out successfully one of the controlling features in the experimental work of the Department.

I venture the assertion, sir, that no one thing has so tended to bring about adverse criticism, no one thing has so tended to weaken and cripple the efforts of the Department, as this general and miscellaneous system of seed distribution. And I make the further suggestion that not more than one-half of the $80,000 appropriated by this bill for the purchase and distribution of seeds would be necessary if the spirit of the original act was adhered to and this distribution made by the Commissioner only among the agriculturists of the country who would make report as the law directs.

It will be noticed, Mr. Chairman, that a few changes have been made in the salary list. So far as the office of the Commissioner is concerned, the committee have recommended that he should be furnished with a stenographer. He is now called upon to avail himself of the services of one or two clerks in the Department who understand stenography. But there is no official stenographer there. The duties of the Commissioner, his large correspondence, and the immense number of details claiming his attention call, in the judgment of the committee, for the appointment of an official stenographer, and we have recommended the appointment of one at a salary of $1,800 a year.

We have made a change, too, so far as the office of chief of the division of accounts is concerned. Under the present law the duties devolving upon this officer are multitudinous in number and exacting in character, and after careful examination the committee recommend there should be an assistant in that department, and they have recommended the appointment of such an assistant at a moderate compensation.

The last appropriation bill devoted $10,000 for the pay of laborers, carpenters, and general assistants. We have cut that down to $8,000, and with the increase I have suggested the increase of appropriations in the office of the Commissioner amounts only to $1,200 in all over the appropriations of last year.

We have made changes in the chemistry division of the Department. And I will say in this connection what is well known to most gentlemen on this floor, that practical chemistry stands as the foundation and corner-stone of experimental agriculture. This division has performed an immense amount of work during the past fiscal year. It has made several thousand demonstrations in the matter of sorghum with a view to ascertaining its sugar-producing capacity. It has made over two hundred analyses of grasses in order to ascertain their capacities to produce food under different circumstances and conditions. It has experimented upon the question of fertilizers, a most important question for the country now, and a still more important question for the future, when our agricultural lands shall be gradually exhausted by much cultivation. In view of the very many important experiments which are about to be made in these various directions during the coming year, the committee have recommended the employment of an additional chemist at the moderate compensation of $1,400 a year, and have made an additional appropriation of $4,000, to be expended by the Commissioner of Agriculture, at his discretion, in the employment of additional expert force whenever the necessities or exigencies of the Departmant may, in his judgment, demand it.

In the department of botany, which is a very necessary and important adjunct to this Department, the work of the botanist being an important auxiliary and factor in the great agricultural interests of this country, the committee have recommended the employment of an assistant. They have been moved to do this by reason of the enlarged amount of work that will come to the attention of the Department in that special branch of it during the coming fiscal year.

I pass rapidly over the other items in the bill, which I think will speak for themselves, and ask the attention of the committee for a few moments only to the provisions for further experiment in connection with the investigation and examination of sorghum as a sugar-producing plant. In the last agricultural bill the sum of $7,500 was devoted to this special purpose by the conference committee appointed to represent the Senate and House of Representatives. There was an oversight in connection with that appropriation. The amount of money so set apart was not, according to the terms of the bill, made immediately available, and as a consequence it was late in the season before the experiments were fairly commenced. Special machinery had to be manufactured, and delay was caused in the proper setting up of this machinery and in preparing it for operation. Meanwhile the plants from which the material was to be expressed were piled up in the Department waiting the completion of the machinery, the result of which was that it was scarcely in a condition for fair or satisfactory experiment at the time that the operation was commenced.

But notwithstanding this fact, notwithstanding the difficulties under which the Department labored, the results of these experiments have convinced the chemists, have convinced the Commissioner of Agriculture and those who have examined the question carefully, that the future experiments in connection with this matter may be conducted upon a basis that will insure success.

In view of these facts the committee have recommended an appropriation of $25,000 to continue and complete and perfect these experiments in connection with sorghum.

Ten thousand dollars have been appropriated in the bill for further experiment in connection with tea culture, and I want to say here briefly that the experiments which have been made so far during the past year, experiments conducted more especially in the State of Georgia, have established the fact that in this country tea can be successfully cultivated. The Commissioner claims further that it can be so manipulated as to be placed on the market in a condition, so far as excellence is concerned, that compares very favorably with some of the best brands of foreign tea. I desire further to call the attention of the members of this House who may desire to investigate this question more deeply to the statements contained in the appendix recently issued to the preliminary report of the Commissioner to the President, bearing upon this question of tea culture.

There was an appropriation in the bill of last season, Mr. Chairman, providing for the construction of artesian wells in the territory in the immediate vicinity of the Rocky Mountains. The Commissioner reports as a result of the experiments made with that appropriation, and as a result of the investigation of the question submitted to him, that there are thousands of acres in this region of country that are under the almost absolute domination of a few ranchmen, who have obtained possession of the few streams and springs in that locality, and who levy tribute upon all who desire to use the lands for grazing purposes. The Commissioner has already commenced operations under the appropriations of last season with a view to making a change in this condition of things. He reports that there is evidence of water-bearing strata in that section of country, and that he has no doubt, should this prove true, in a very short period of time individual property-holders there will be able themselves to sink their own wells, leading up to the reclamation of this large region of country and its adaptability to grazing and other purposes.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman from New York state the points of difference between this bill and the law regulating the Agricultural Department; the appropriation law?

Mr. COVERT. Do I understand the gentleman to ask the difference between this and the organic law?

Mr. ATKINS. No, sir; the appropriation law of the present fiscal year.

Mr. RICHMOND. What is the difference in the appropriation of last year and that which the committee now propose in this bill?

Mr. COVERT. The amount appropriated by this bill is $292,000. The amount appropriated by the last bill was $253,300. The increase over the last appropriation bill is $35,700.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman state in what matters there is an increase and in what matters there is a decrease?

Mr. COVERT. I have been attempting to explain just those particulars.

Mr. WHITE. I think the gentleman from New York should be permitted without interruption to make his explanation of the policy of the bill.

Mr. COVERT. I had made the statement, Mr. Chairman, that one of the large items, or one of the larger items in this bill, leading to an increase over the expenditure of last year, was the amount appropriated by the committee for the continuation of the experiments in sorghum. Other additions are the appropriation for tea culture, and a slight increase for assistants in the office of the Commissioner and in the division of chemistry.

With reference to this matter of the artesian well construction, the committee have deemed it best to recommend an appropriation in the present bill for the continuation of the work.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman state to the House what has been done in carrying out the action taken which authorized the artesian wells to be sunk?

Mr. COVERT. The Commmissioner, when called upon for information by the committee with reference to this point, stated that he had progressed with the experiments in this connection; that he had selected a plain a few miles from the Arkansas River for that purpose; that he has caused one well to be sunk, and that he has every reason to suppose from the results which have followed that the section mentioned has a water-bearing stratum, and he is confident of the good results which will follow the completion of these experiments.

A question, sir, of vast and constantly growing importance to the whole country is suggested by one of the paragraphs in the pending bill. I refer to the matter of forestry, the preservation of our timber interests. Nature has been most bountiful to us in this regard, and like heirs to an immense fortune, we have to large extent squandered our resources without adequate thought as to possible needs for the future. It may be matter of surprise to very many that the Northern, Eastern, and Middle States have to great extent exhausted their supplies of pine timber. The State of Maine, long known as the "Pine Tree State," now exports next to none of this timber; and her ship-yards draw their supplies in most part from the States of the South. The hemlock and spruce timber of this section is rapidly decreasing and decaying; and the whole Northern, Middle, and Eastern States have for more than a score of years been drawing largely upon Canada and Michigan for a part of their timber supply. The Canadian authorities have been seeking for some years, through inquiries by parliamentary committees, for remedies for the scarcity which long ago made itself manifest to them in this regard. We have scarcely stopped to ask the question, "What will be the effect if this swift consumption is continued?" A rapid advance in price will be the first herald to tell us of our loss. Further and consequent prostration in ship-building, railroad construction, and private business enterprises will follow; and the baleful results to the whole nation can scarcely be estimated. In foreign countries attention was long ago directed to this question, and rigid laws have been enacted for the preservation of their forest treasures.

The committee has inserted in the pending bill a provision making it obligatory upon the Department to continue its inquiry in this direction, to the end that full information may be obtained upon the subject and that appropriate legislation may be shaped in the future to prevent a possible national calamity in this regard.

But a few moments more, sir, and I have done. While I have opposed from my place on this floor, uniformly and consistently, the erection of this Department into an Executive Department of the Government, I am not, I trust, disloyal to the cause of agriculture and the interests of agriculturists. I have the honor to represent a district whose interests are in large measure agricultural. I realize the worth to his community and country of every practical farmer. In every legitimate way I want his interests advanced, his rights protected, and his influence extended. I have faith enough in the coming farmer, in the agriculturist of the future, to believe that in time (and I trust the time will not be far distant) the necessity for the existence of this Department will be no longer felt.

The controlling idea involved in the creation of the department is that our wide domain should be tested, to ascertain what can be most successfully produced in its various sections. Experiments in this direction cannot be profitably conducted forever. Sooner or later the work of the department should be closed, and meanwhile I cannot see why the farmer should not, like other men engaged in other pursuits, learn to experiment for himself and act for himself, without reference to governmental aid. The misfortune has been that it has been the exception rather than the rule to give to the boy who intended to be a farmer anything like a proper preliminary education to fit him for the work before him, or even to interest him in his coming work. My experience as a school officer has been—and the experience of others will corroborate the statement—that it is the exception rather than the rule in agricultural districts, where the pupils go from the school to the farm, for even the first principles of chemistry, or botany, or entomology to be taught in the public schools of those districts.

The man who would carry on a mechanical trade fits himself for it by a proper apprenticeship. The professional man subjects himself to a long and studious preparation for the work before him. Government is not asked to educate them for their various callings. No appropriations are made from year to year by Congress to furnish them with information relative to their several branches of industry. The time should approach, and I cannot but think, sir, it should come speedily when the work of this department of the Government should cease. This period will arrive when those who are engaged in agriculture look upon their business as a profession calling for the exercise of thought as earnest, of investigation as profound, as any profession practiced anywhere the wide world over.

I want to repeat, sir, for fear I may be misunderstood—and I fear I have been misunderstood—that I stand here to-day not only as a friend of the practical farmer, but as his appreciative and sympathetic friend. Not an effort he makes to render every acre more productive, not a desire on his part to ennoble and dignify his calling that does not have all that I can give, my genuine appreciation and earnest sympathy. And, sir, I have pleasure in knowing that in the ranks of those who have given to agriculture in this country a distinctive name and character are men of brain and power, who

While they labor, learn to think.

As a result of this combination of thought with labor, model farms are scattered throughout the length and breadth of the land, and model farmers find pleasure and profit in their cultivation. Through the efforts of men like these, farmers who think while they work, town and county and State agricultural societies are formed without expense to the Government, and the results of experiments made and tests applied are communicated through these mediums. I have faith to believe, sir, that with the continued growth and spread of thought among those engaged in agriculture, at no far distant day a national agricultural society, to be formed by the voluntary association of progressive agriculturists representing every section of the Union, may take the place of the existing Department and achieve for the people of this country all that the Department under then changed conditions could hope to accomplish.

The farmer of the future, keeping step with the demands of the time, will be known and recognized as the man of thought as well as of action. He will be fitted by preliminary training for the proper performance of his work. He will have his library, large or small, of agricultural works, just as the lawyer or physician of to-day have their libraries, and with the same necessity for study and investigation in his case as in theirs. And this will be accomplished, not by subsidies from the public Treasury, not by bounties from the Government, but because the demands of the age will make these conditions necessary. When that time comes this Department of the Government will have accomplished its mission; and the Congress of the United States, without injury or injustice to any class or to any interest, can and should pass an act repealing the law which called this Department into being.

But, sir, until then, and so long as this Department is a branch of the Government, I join hands with the most enthusiastic friends of agriculture in asking that appropriations large enough to meet every possible requirement, so far as the legitimate purposes of this Department are concerned, shall be freely made by the Federal Congress. And it was in this spirit that I for one assisted in the formulation of the bill which I have now the honor to submit to this House for its final action.

Mr. HURD. I send up to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an amendment which I shall propose to this bill at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of one statistician, $1,975; one clerk of class 4, $1,775; two clerks of class 3, $3,100; one clerk of class 2, $1,440; two clerks of class 1, $1,440. And the statistician shall, under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture, ascertain and report to the next regular session of Congress what effect the customs-revenue laws of the United States have had heretofore, and what effect said laws will, if continued in force, probably have hereafter on the agricultural interests of the people of the United States; whether the effect of such laws has been to increase or diminish the price of American agricultural products in the markets of foreign countries; whether their effect has been to increase or diminish the price of clothing and agricultural tools and implements in this country; and whether or not the wages of farm laborers and the profits of persons engaged in agricultural pursuits have been in any manner affected by such laws, and if so, in what way and to what extent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is that amendment offered for consideration at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to give notice that he will propose at the proper time the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. HURD. Mr. Chairman, in the last days of the late political canvass the supporters of one of the candidates for the Presidency sought votes for their favorite by charging that the election of the other candidate would involve a disturbance of the present tariff. The proposition assumed that the present tariff ought not to be disturbed. It is claimed that the triumph of the successful candidate was due to the introduction of this issue into the campaign, and means an approval of the present protective method of collecting duties. I do not so understand it. The issue was not discussed before the people. It was introduced prominently so late that there was not time to discuss it. Those who should have contended for tariff for revenue only laid down their banner without a struggle to defend it. The result, therefore, in my judgment, has not the slightest significance so far as this question is concerned.

But the effect of what was said has been to direct public inquiry to the subject. For years the advocates of tariff reform have endeavored to interest the people in the question, but other matters of more apparent pressing importance have occupied their attention. Many began to fear that what has been aptly termed a system of "reciprocal rapine" had interested so many that the people would be content with their burdens because they did not realize their weight. But how to make them realize it without discussion?—and of what avail was discussion when they would not listen?—were the questions. Fortunately the protectionists have solved the problem. They proclaimed that protection should become an issue in politics, and thereby invited the country to decide it. For one, I accept the challenge they have offered; I pick up the gauntlet they have thrown down. Prudence it seems to me would have dictated to these supporters of monopoly the policy of silence; but they have rashly dragged their system into the light of day. It will not be long until its crudities will be made known, its extortions and robberies exposed, with the early result, I predict, of its complete overthrow.

In the remarks I shall submit to-day I expect to say nothing new, nothing which has not been much better said many times before. I have availed myself of whatever I have been able to find, whether in books or speeches upon the subject, not to proclaim a new doctrine, but to emphasize and illustrate an old one, one, too, approved in every national platform of the party of which I am a member, and to bring sharply and clearly as I can before the public mind the reasons which should induce the country to adopt it.

At the very threshold it is proper to define the terms I shall use and state the exact propositions I purpose to maintain. A tariff is a tax upon imported goods. Like other taxes which are levied, it should be imposed only to raise revenue for the Government. It is true that incidental protection to some industries will occur when the duty is placed upon articles which may enter into competition with those of domestic manufacture. I do not propose to discuss now how this incidental protection shall be distributed. This will be a subsequent consideration when the preliminary question has been settled as to what shall be the nature of the tariff itself. The present tariff imposes duties upon nearly four thousand articles, and was levied and is defended upon the ground that American industries should be protected. Thus protection has been made the object; revenue the incident. Indeed, in many cases the duty is so high that no revenue whatever is raised for the Government, and in nearly all so high that much less revenue is collected than might be realized. So true is this that if the present tariff were changed so as to make it thereby a revenue tariff, one-fifth at least could be added to the receipts of the Treasury from imports. Whenever I use the phrase free trade or free trader I mean either a tariff for revenue only or one who advocates it.

So far as a tariff for revenue is concerned, I do not oppose it, even though it may contain some objectionable incidental protection. The necessities of the Government require large revenues, and it is not proposed to interfere with a tariff so long as it is levied to produce them; but to a tariff levied for protection in itself and for its own sake I do object. I therefore oppose the present tariff, and the whole doctrine by which it is attempted to be justified. I make war against all its protective features, and insist that the laws which contain them shall be amended so that out of the importations upon which the duty is levied the greatest possible revenue for the Government may be obtained.

What, then, is the theory of protection? It is based upon the idea that foreign products imported into this country will enter into competition with domestic products and undersell them in the home market, thus crippling if not destroying domestic production. To prevent this the price of the foreign goods in the home market is increased so as to keep them out of the country altogether or to place the foreigner in the cost of production upon the same footing as the American producer. This is proposed to be done by levying a duty upon the foreign importation. If it be so high that the importer cannot pay it and sell the goods at a profit, the facilities of production between this and other countries are said to be equalized, and the American producer is said to be protected. It will be seen, therefore, that protection means the increase of price. Without it the fabric has no foundation on which to rest. If the foreign goods are still imported, the importer adds the duty paid to the selling price. If he cannot import with profit, the American producer raises his price to a point always below that at which the foreign goods could be profitably brought into the country and controls the market. In either event there is an increase of price of the products sought to be protected. The bald proposition, therefore, is that American industries can and ought to be protected by increasing the prices of the products of such industries.

There are three popular opinions industriously cultivated and strengthened by adroit advocates upon which the whole system rests, and to which appeals are ever confidently made. These opinions are erroneous, and lead to false conclusions, and should be first considered in every discussion of this question.

The first is, that the balance of trade is in our favor when our exportations exceed our importations. Upon this theory it is argued that it cannot be unwise to put restrictions upon importations, for they say that at one and the same time you give protection to our industries and keep the balance of trade in our favor. But the slightest investigation will show that this proposition cannot be maintained. A single illustration, often repeated, but never old in this discussion, will demonstrate it. Let a ship set sail from Portland, Maine, with a cargo of staves registered at the port of departure as worth $5,000. They are carried to the West India Islands, where staves are in demand, and exchanged for sugar or molasses. The ship returns, and after duty paid the owner sells his sugar and molasses at a profit of $5,000. Here more has been imported than exported. Upon this transaction the protectionist would say that the balance of trade was against us $5,000; the free trader says that that sum represents the profit to the shipper upon his traffic, and the true balance in our favor.

Suppose that after it has set sail the vessel with its cargo had been lost. In such case five thousand dollars' worth of goods would have been exported, with no importation against it. The exportation has exceeded the importation that sum. Is not the balance of trade, according to the protection theory, to that amount in our favor? Then let the protectionist turn pirate and scuttle and sink all the vessels laden with our expoits, and soon the balance of trade in our favor will be large enough to satisfy even most advocates of the American protective system. [Laughter and applause.] The true theory is that in commerce the overplus of the importation above the exportation represents the profit accruing to the country. This overplus, deducting the expenses, is real wealth added to the land. Push the two theories to their last position and the true one will be clearly seen. Export everything, import nothing, though the balance of trade may be said to be overwhelmingly in our favor, there is poverty, scarcity, death. Import everything, export nothing, we then will have in addition to our own all the wealth of the world in our possession.

Secondly, it is said that a nation should be independent of foreign nations, lest in time of war it might find itself helpless or defenseless. Free trade, it is charged, makes a people dependent upon foreigners. But traffic is exchange. Foreign products do not come into a country unless domestic products go out. This dependence, therefore, is mutual. By trade with foreign nations they are as dependent upon us as we upon them, and in the event of a disturbance of peace the nation with which we would be at war would lose just as much as we would lose, and both as to the war would in that regard stand upon terms of equality. It must not be forgotten that the obstruction of trade between nations is one of the greatest occasions of war. It frequently gives rise to misunderstandings which result in serious conflicts. By removing these obstacles and making trade as free as possible, nations are brought closer together, the interests of their people become intermingled, business associations are formed between them, which go far to keep down national dispute, and prevent the wars in which the dependent nation is said to be so helpless. Japan and China have for centuries practiced the protective theory of independence of foreigners, and yet, in a war with other nations, they would be the most helpless people in the world. That nation is the most independent which knows most of, and trades most with, the world, and by such knowledge and trade is able to avail itself of the products of the skill, intellect, and genius of all the nations of the earth.

A third erroneous impression sought to be made upon the public mind is that whatever increases the amount of labor in a country is a benefit to it. Protection, it is argued, will increase the amount of labor, and therefore will increase a country's prosperity. The error in this proposition lies in mistaking the true nature of labor. It regards it as the end, not as the means to an end. Men do not labor merely for the sake of labor, but that out of its products they may derive support and comfort for themselves and those dependent upon them. The result therefore does not depend upon the amount of labor done, but upon the value of the product. That country therefore is the most prosperous which enables the laborer to obtain the greatest possible value for the product of his toil, not that which imposes the greatest labor upon him. If this were not the case, men were better off before the appliances of steam as motive power were discovered, or railroads were built, or the telegraph was invented. The man who constructs a labor-saving machine is a public enemy; and he would be a public benefactor who would restore the good old times when the farmer never had a leisure day and the sun never set on the toil of the mechanic. No, Mr. Chairman, it is the desire of every laborer to get the maximum of result from the minimum of effort. That system therefore can be of no advantage to him which, while it gives him employment, robs him of its fruits. This, it will be seen, protection does, while free trade, giving him unrestricted control of the product of his labor, enables him to get the fullest value for it in markets of his own selection.

The protectionist, relying upon the propositions I have thus hurriedly discussed, urges many specious reasons for his system, to a few of which only do I intend to call attention to-day.

In the first place it is urged that protection will develop the resources of a country, which without it would remain undeveloped. Of course this to be of advantage to a country must be a general aggregate increase of development, for if it be an increase of some resources as a result of a diminution in others, the people as a whole can be no better off after protection than before. But the general resources cannot be increased by a tariff. There can only be such an increase by an addition to the disposable capital of the country to be applied to the development of resources. But legislation cannot make this. If it could it would only be necessary to enact laws indefinitely to increase capital indefinitely. But if any legislation could accomplish this, it would not be protective legislation. As already shown the theory of protection is to make prices higher in order to make business profitable. This necessarily increases the expense of production, which keeps foreign capital away because it can be employed in the protected industries more profitably elsewhere. The domestic capital therefore must be relied upon for the proposed development. As legislation cannot increase that capital, if it be tempted by the higher prices to the business protected it must be taken from some other business or investment. If there are more workers in factories there will be fewer artisans. If there are more workers in shops there will be fewer farmers. If there are more in the towns there will be fewer in the country. The only effect of protection, therefore, in this point of view, can be to take capital from some employment to put it into another, so that the aggregate disposable capital cannot be increased, nor the aggregate development of the resources of a country be greater with a tariff than without.

But, secondly, it is said that protection increases the number of industries, thereby diversifying labor and making a variety in the occupations of a people who otherwise might be confined to a single branch of employment. This argument proceeds upon the assumption that there would be no diversification of labor without protection. In other words, it is assumed that but for protection our people would devote themselves to agriculture. This, however, is not true. Even if a community were purely agricultural, the necessities of the situation would make diversification of industry. There must be blacksmiths, and shoemakers, and millers, and merchants, and carpenters, and other artisans. To each one of these employments, as population increases, more and more will devote themselves, and with each year new demands will spring up, which will create new industries to supply them. I was born in the midst of a splendid farming country. The business of nine-tenths of the people in my native county was farming. My intelligent boyhood was spent there from 1850 to 1860, when there was no tariff for protection. There were thriving towns for the general trading. There were woolen mills and operatives. There were flouring mills and millers. There were iron founders and their employés. There were artisans of every description. There were grocers and merchants, with every variety of goods and wares for sale; there were banks and bankers; there was all the diversification of industry that a thriving, industrious, and intelligent community required; not established by protection nor by Government aid, but growing naturally out of the wants and necessities of the people. Such a diversification is always healthful, because it is natural, and will continue so long as the people are industrious and thrifty. The diversification which protection makes is forced and artificial. Suppose protection had come to my native country to further diversify industries. It would have begun by giving higher prices to some industry already established, or profits greater than the average rate to some new industry which it would have started. This would have disturbed the natural order. It would necessarily have embarrassed some interests to help the protected ones. The loss in the most favorable view would have been equal to the gain, and besides trade would inevitably have been annoyed by the obstruction of its natural channels.

The worst feature of this kind of diversified industry is that the protected ones never willingly give up the Government aid. They scare at competition as a child at a ghost. As soon as the markets seem against them, they rush to Congress for further help. They are never content with the protection they have; they are always eager for more. In this dependence upon the Government bounty the persons protected learn to distrust themselves; and protection therefore inevitably destroys that manly, sturdy spirit of individuality and independence which should characterize the successful American business man.

Thirdly, it is said that protection gives increased employment to labor and enhances the wages of workingmen. For a long time no position was more strenuously insisted upon by the advocates of the protective system than that the wages of labor would be increased under it. At this point in the discussion I shall only undertake to show that it is impossible that protection should produce this result. What determines the amount of wages paid? Some maintain that it is the amount of the wage fund existing at the time that the labor is done. Under this theory it is claimed that at any given time there is a certain amount of capital to be applied to the payment of wages, as certain and fixed as though its amount had been determined in advance. Others maintain that the amount of wages is fixed by what the laborer makes, or, in other words, by the product of his work, and that, therefore, his wage is determined by the efficiency of his labor alone. Both these views are partly true. The wages of the laborer are undoubtedly determined by the efficiency of his work, but the aggregate amount paid for labor cannot exceed the amount properly chargeable to the wage fund without in a little time diminishing the profits of production and ultimately the quantity of labor employed.

But whichever theory be true, it is clear that protection can add nothing to the amount of wages. It cannot increase the amount of capital applicable to the payment of wages, unless it can be shown that the aggregate capital of a country can be increased by legislation, nor can it add to the efficiency of labor, for that depends upon individual effort exclusively. A man who makes little in a day now may in a year make much more in the same time; his labor has become more efficient. Whether this shall be done depends upon the taste, temperament, application, aptitude, and skill of the individual. No one will pretend that protection can increase the aggregate of these qualities in the labor of the country. The result is that it is impossible for protection, either by adding to the wage fund or increasing the efficiency of labor, to enhance the wages of laboring-men, a theory which I shall shortly show is incontrovertibly established by the facts.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, briefly present a few of the principal objections to a tariff for protection. As has been shown the basis of protection is an increase in the price of the protected products. Who pays this increased price? I shall not stop now to consider the argument often urged that it is paid by the foreign producer, because it can be easily shown to the contrary by every one's experience. I shall for this argument assume it as demonstrated that the increase in price which protection makes is paid by the consumer. This suggests the first great objection to protection, that it compels the consumer to pay more for goods than they are really worth, ostensibly to help the business of a producer. Now, consumers constitute the vast majority of the people. The producers of protected articles are few in comparison with them. It is true that most men are both producers and consumers. But for the great majority there is little or no protection for what they produce, but large protection for what they consume. The tariff is principally levied upon woolen goods, lumber, furniture, stoves, and other manufactured articles of iron, and upon sugar and salt. The necessities of life are weighted with the burden. It is out of the necessities of the people, therefore, that the money is realized to support the protective system. I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is beyond the sphere of true governmental power to tax one man to help the business of another. It is by power taking money from one to give to another. This is robbery, nothing more nor less. When a man earns a dollar it is his own, and no power of reasoning can justify the legislative power in taking it from him except for the uses of the Government.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, the present tariff takes hundreds of millions of dollars every year from the farmer, the laborer, and other consumers, under the claim of enriching the manufacturer. It may not be much for each one to contribute, yet in the aggregate it is an enormous sum. For many, too, it is very much. The statistics will show that every head of a family who receives four hundred dollars a year in wages pays at least one hundred dollars on account of protection. Put such a tax on all incomes and the country would be in a ferment of excitement until it was removed. But it is upon the poor and lowly that the tax is placed, and their voices are not often heard in shaping the policies of tariff legislation. I repeat, the product of one's labor is his own. It is his highest right, subject only to the necessities of the Government, to do with it as he pleases. Protection invades, destroys that right. It ought to be destroyed, until every American freeman can spend his money where it will be of the most service to him.

To illustrate the cost of protection to the consumer, consider its operation in increasing the price of two or three of the leading articles protected. Take paper for example. The duty on that commodity is 20 per cent. ad valorem. Most of the articles which enter into its manufacture or are required in the process of making it are increased in price by protection. The result is that the price of paper to the consumer is increased nearly 15 per cent.; that is, if the tariff were taken off paper and the articles used in its manufacture, paper would be 15 per cent. cheaper to the buyer. The paper-mills for five years have produced nearly one hundred millions of dollars' worth of paper a year. The consumers have been compelled to pay fifteen millions a year to the manufacturer more than the paper could have been bought for without the tariff. In five years this has amounted to $75,000,000, an immense sum paid to protection. It is a tax upon books and newspapers; it is a tax upon intelligence; it is a premium upon ignorance. So heavy had the burden of this tax become that every newspaper man in the district I have the honor to represent has appealed to Congress to take the duty off. The Government has derived little revenue from the paper duty. It has gone almost entirely to the manufacturer, who himself has not been benefited as anticipated, as will presently be seen. These burdens have been imposed to protect the paper manufacturer against the foreigner in face of the confident prediction made by one of the most experienced paper men in the country, that if all protection were taken off paper and the material used in its manufacture the manufacturer would be able to successfully compete with the foreigner in nearly every desirable market in the world.

Take blankets also for example. The tariff on coarse blankets is nearly 100 per cent. ad valorem. They can be bought in most of the markets of the world for $2 a pair. Yet our poor, who use the most of that grade of blankets, are compelled to pay about $4 a pair. The Government derives little revenue from it, as the importation of these blankets for years has been trifling. This tax has been a heavy burden upon the poor during this severe winter, a tax running into the millions to support protection. Heaven save a country from a system which begrudges to the shivering poor the blankets to make them comfortable in the winter and the cold!

Secondly, protection has diminished the income of the laborer from his wages. The first factor in the ascertainment of the value of wages is their purchasing power, or how much can be bought with them. If in one country the wages are $5 a day and in another only $1, if the laborer can in the one country with the $1 purchase more of the necessary articles required in daily consumption, he in fact is better paid than the former in the other who gets $5 a day. Admit for a moment that protection raises the wages of the laborer, it also raises the price of nearly all the necessaries of life, and what he makes in wages he more than loses in the increase of prices of what he is obliged to buy. As already stated, a head of a family who earns $400 per year is compelled to pay $100 more for what he needs, on account of protection. What difference to him is it whether the $100 are taken out of his wages before they are paid, or taken from him afterward in the increased price of articles he cannot get along without? In both cases he really only receives $300 for his year's labor. The statistics show that the average increased cost of twelve articles most required in daily consumption in 1874 over 1860 was 92 per cent., while the average increase of the wages of eight artisans, including cabinet-makers, coopers, carpenters, painters, shoemakers, tailors, tanners, and tinsmiths was only 60 per cent., demonstrating that the purchasing power of labor had under protection in thirteen years depreciated 19½ per cent. But protection has not even raised the nominal wages in most of the unprotected industries. I find that the wages of the farm hand, the day laborer, and the ordinary artisan are in most places now no higher than they were in 1860.

But it is confidently asserted that the wages of laborers in the protected industries are higher because of protection. Admit it. I have not the figures for 1880, but in 1870 there were not 500,000 of them; but of the laborers in other industries there were 12,000,000, exclusive of those in agriculture, who were 6,000,000 more. Why should the wages of the half million be increased beyond their natural rate while those of the others remain unchanged? More. Why should the wages of the 18,000,000 be diminished that those of the half million should be increased? for an increase cannot be made in the wage rate of one class without a proportionate decrease in that of others. But the wages of labor in protected industries are not permanently increased by protection. Another very important factor in ascertaining the value of wages is the continuance or the steadiness of the employment. Two dollars a day for half the year is no more than a dollar a day for the whole year. Employment in most protected industries is spasmodic. In the leading industries for the past ten years employment has not averaged more than three-fourths of the time, and not at very high wages. Within the last year manufacturers of silk, carpets, nails, and many other articles of iron, of various kinds of glassware and furniture, and coal producers have shut down their works for a part of the time or reduced the hours of labor.

Production has been too great. To stop this and prevent the reduction of profits through increasing competition, the first thing done is to diminish the production, thus turning employés out of employment. Wages are diminished or stopped until times are flush again. With the time estimated in which the laborers are not at work, the average rate of wages for the ten years preceding 1880 did not equal the wages in similar industries for the ten years preceding 1860 under a revenue tariff. Indeed, in many branches the wages have not been so high as those received by the pauper labor, so called, in Europe. But it is manifest that the wages in these industries cannot for any long period be higher than the average rate in the community, for if the wages be higher, labor will crowd into the employments thus favored until the rate is brought down to the general level. So true is this that it is admitted by many protectionists that wages are not higher in the protected industries than in others.

It should not be forgotten that since the adoption of free trade in England wages are more than three times higher than they were under protection. In Germany, with protection, wages are lower than in England without. The statistics of this country show that in 1874, with an average duty of 45 per cent., labor was only 18½ per cent. of the value of the manufactured goods, while in 1860, with a revenue tariff of only 19 per cent., the labor was 20 per cent. of the cost of manufacturing. In other words, with the tariff low more labor in proportion to the amount of goods manufactured was employed than with the tariff high.

Thirdly, the effect of protection is disastrous to most of the protected industries themselves. We have seen that many of them have in recent years been compelled to diminish production. The cause of this is manifest. Production confines them to the American market. The high prices they are compelled to pay for protected materials which enter into the manufacture of their products disable them from going into the foreign market. The profits which they make under the first impulse of protection invite others into the same business. As a result, therefore, more goods are made than the American market can consume. Prices go down to some extent through the competition, but rarely under the cost of production, increased, as we have seen, by the enhanced price of material required. The losses threatened by such competition are sought to be averted by the diminution of production. Combinations of those interested are formed to stop work or reduce it until the stock on hand has been consumed. Production then begins again and continues until the same necessity calls again for the same remedy. But this remedy is arbitrary, capricious, and unsatisfactory. Some will not enter into the combination at all. Others will secretly violate the agreement from the beginning. Others still, when their surplus stock has been sold, and before the general price has risen, will begin to manufacture again. There is no power to enforce any bargain they have made, and they find the plan only imperfectly curing the difficulty. They remain uncertain what to do, embarrassed and doubtful as to the future. They have through protection violated the natural laws of supply and demand, and human regulations are powerless to relieve them from the penalty.

Take, as an illustration of the operation of the system, the article of paper. One of the first effects of the general tariff was to increase the price of nearly everything the manufacturer required to make the paper. Fifteen millions of dollars a year through the protection are taken from the consumer. The manufacturer himself is able to retain but a small part of it, as he is obliged to pay to some other protected industry for its products, they in turn to some others who furnished them with protected articles for their use, and so on to the end. The result being nominal prices are raised all around; the consumers pay the fifteen millions, while nobody receives any substantial benefit, because what one makes in the increased price of his product he loses in the increased price he is obliged to pay for the required products of others. The consumer is the loser, and though competition may occasionally reduce prices for him to a reasonable rate, it never to any appreciable extent compensates him for the losses he sustains through the enhanced price which the protective system inevitably causes.

It is not to be disputed that many of the protected manufacturers have grown rich. In very many cases I think it can be demonstrated that their wealth has resulted from some patent which has given them a monopoly in particular branches of manufacturing, or from some other advantage which they have employed exclusively in their business. In such cases they would have prospered without protection as with it. I think there are few, except in the very inception of a manufacturing enterprise, or in abnormal cases growing out of war or destruction of property, or the combinations of large amounts of capital, where protection alone has enriched men. The result is the robbery of the consumer with no ultimate good to most of the protected industries.

At a meeting of the textile manufacturers in Philadelphia the other day, one of the leading men in that interest said:

> The fact is that the textile manufacturers of Philadelphia, the center of the American trade, are fast approaching a crisis, and realize that something must be done, and that soon. Cotton and woolen mills are fast springing up over the South and West, and the prospects are that we will soon lose much of our trade in the coarse fabrics by reason of cheap competition. The only thing we can do, therefore, is to turn our attention to the higher plane, and endeavor to make goods equal to those imported. We cannot do this now, because we have not a sufficient supply either of the culture which begets designs or of the skill which manipulates the fibers.

What a commentary this upon protection, which has brought to such a crisis one of the chief industries protected, and which is here confessed to have failed after twenty years to enable it to compete even in our own markets with foreign goods of the finer quality. What is true of textile manufacturing is also true of many other industries. What remedy, then, will afford the American manufacturer relief? Not the one here suggested of increasing the manufacture of goods of finer quality, for, aside from the impracticability of the plan, this will only aggravate the difficulty by adding to the aggregate stock in the home market, but the increase of the market for what can already be manufactured. The American demand cannot consume what they produce. They must therefore enlarge their market or stop production. To adopt the latter course is to invite ruin. The market cannot be increased in this country. It must be found in other countries. Foreign markets must be sought. But these cannot be opened as long as we close our markets to their products, with which in most instances they only can buy; in other words, as long as we continue the protective system.

I say, therefore, to the American manufacturer, sooner or later you must choose between the alternative of ruin or the abandonment of protection. Why hesitate in the decision? Are not Canada and Mexico and South America your natural markets? England now supplies them with almost all the foreign goods they buy. Why should not you? Your coal and iron lie together in the mountain-side and can be almost dropped without carriage into your furnaces, while in England the miners must go thousands of feet under the earth for those products. Your labor suffers for want of steady employment. The interest on the pubilc securities will soon be reduced, which cannot but have a healthful influence on the cost of manufacturing. The methods and opportunities of transportation are better than those enjoyed by any other nation of the earth. In fine, the situation is yours. Break down your protective barrier. All the world will soon do the same. Their walls will disappear when ours fall. Open every market of the world to your products, give steady employment to your laborers. In a little while you will have the reward which nature always gives to those who obey her laws, and will escape the ruin which many of your most intelligent operators see impending over your industries.

I have not time to-day to more than refer to the ruinous effect of protection upon our carrying trade. In 1856, 75 per cent. of the total value of our imports and exports was carried in American vessels, while in 1879 but 17 per cent. was carried in such vessels, and in 1880 the proportion was still less. In 1855, 381 ships and barks were built in the United States, while in 1879 there were only 37. It is a question of very few years at this rate until American vessels and the American flag will disappear from the high seas. Protection has more than all else to do with the prostration of this trade. It accomplishes this result (1) by enhancing the price of the materials which enter into the construction of vessels, so that our ship-builders cannot compete with foreigners engaged in the same business; (2) by increasing the cost of domestic production so that American manufactured goods cannot profitably be exported; and (3) by disabling our merchants from bringing back on their return trips foreign cargoes in exchange for our products.

Nor will I say anything as to the increase of the crime of smuggling under protection, a crime which has done incalculable harm to honest dealers, particularly on the border, and a crime out of which some of the largest fortunes in the country have been made.

There are many who will admit the abstract justice of much that I have said who profess to believe that it will not do to disturb the tariff now. But for the protectionist that time never comes. When the depression in business was universal, they said you must not disturb the tariff now, because the times are so hard and there is so much suffering. Now, when business has improved, they say you must not interfere with the tariff, because times are good and you may bring suffering again. When the present tariff was first levied it was defended as a temporary expedient only, required as a necessity by war.

Now that a quarter of a century nearly has passed by and peace has been restored for fifteen years, the advocates of protection are as determined to hold on to the Government bounty as ever. If they are to be consulted upon the subject as to when the people shall have relief, the system will be perpetual.

It is said we must not disturb the tariff because we must raise so much revenue. I do not propose to disturb it to diminish revenue, but to increase it. The plan I propose will add one-fifth at least to the revenue of the country. It is protection I propose to get rid of, not revenue. It has been well said that revenue ceases where protection begins.

It is claimed that by taking away protection you will embarrass many industries by compelling them to close up and discharge their employés. I do not believe that the changing of the present tariff to a revenue tariff will produce this result. I believe that at once every manufacturer will make more in the diminished cost of production than he will lose in the taking away of protection. But if there should be danger to any industry I would provide against it in the law which changes the tariff so that if there should be any displacement of labor there will be no loss in consequence.

No more perfect illustration of the effect of free trade has been shown than in the history of the United States. Very much of our prosperity is due to the fact that the productions of each State can be sold in every other State without restriction. During the war the most potent argument for the cause of the Union was found in the apprehension that disunion meant restriction of commerce, and particularly the placing of the mouth of the Mississippi River under foreign control. The war was fought, therefore, to maintain free trade, and the victory was the triumph of free trade. The Union every day exhibits the advantages of the system.

Are these due to the accident of a State being a member of that Union or to the beneficent principle of the system itself? What would prevent similar results following if, subject only to necessities of government, it were extended to Mexico, to Canada, to South America, to the world? In such extension the United States have everything to gain, nothing to lose. This country would soon become the supply-house of the world. We will soon have cattle and harvests enough for all nations. Our cotton is everywhere in demand. It is again king. Its crown has been restored, and in all the markets of the world it waves its royal scepter. Out of our coal and minerals can be manufactured everything which human ingenuity can devise. Our gold and silver mines will supply the greater part of the precious metals for the use of the arts and trade.

With the opportunity of unrestricted exchange of these products, how limitless the horizon of our possibilities. Let American adventurousness and genius be free upon the high seas, to go wherever they please and bring back whatever they please, and the oceans will swarm with American sails, and the land will laugh with the plenty within its borders. The trade of Tyre and Sidon, the far-extending commerce of the Venetian Republic, the wealth-producing traffic of the Netherlands will be as dreams in contrast with the stupendous reality which American enterprise will develop in our own generation. Through the humanizing influence of the trade thus encouraged I see nations become the friends of nations, and the causes of war disappear. I see the influence of the great Republic in the amelioration of the condition of the poor and the oppressed in every land, and in the moderation of the arbitrariness of power. Upon the wings of free trade will be carried the seeds of free government, to be scattered everywhere to grow and ripen into harvests of free peoples in every nation under the sun. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. COVERT. I move the committee rise for the purpose of putting some limit to the general debate upon this appropriation bill.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, for ten days, at the request of the gentleman who has just addressed the House, there has been an understanding he should speak on this bill and that I should follow him for an hour, with leave to yield such portions of it as I might deem proper to others.

Mr. COVERT. I only ask to fix some period when the debate on this bill shall be closed.

Mr. KELLEY. I decline to yield.

Mr. COVERT. There is no disposition to cut off the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but there are many gentlemen upon the floor who ask when the general debate on this bill will close. They wish to be here at the time the bill is considered by paragraphs, and in order that they may know just at what time action on the bill begins, I want to go into the House and limit the general debate.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no intention to deprive the gentleman from Pennsylvania of any part of his hour.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, on the 6th of December last the gentleman from Ohio introduced and caused to be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means what is now popularly known as "the Hurd free-trade resolution." It embodies nine propositions, which the author declares set forth the principles that should regulate any tariff levied by the American Congress. In view of our varied, complex, and expanding industries; of the illimitable store and variety of raw material for manufacture with which our country is endowed, vital elements of which are found in every part of our country, and which, by reason of this wide diffusion, necessitate internal traffic, and offer remunerative business to the amplest conceivable systems of internal transportation; of the immense capital, most of which having been created by our productive industries, is now invested in railroads, buildings, and machinery constructed for the transportation and conversion of native raw materials into finished commodities; of the constantly increasing millions of people to which these furnish employment at wages so remunerative as to make our home market for the productions of the field and the factory the best market in the world, and to invite an immense annual immigration —in view, I say, of all these stupendous facts, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] in this resolution proposes to declare it to be the duty of Congress to modify our tariff, to which these great interests have adjusted themselves, in accordance with a few abstract propositions which have commended themselves to his judgment.

In January, 1880, the Corps Legislatif entered upon an exhaustive discussion of the effect upon French interests of the commercial treaties between France and other countries. M. Thiers bore a conspicuous part in that controversy. Having in his opening speech presented the protectionist side of the question, from time to time as occasion invited he defended the positions he had assumed. In the course of his speech on the 26th of January he exclaimed, "My adversary proves that he has studied the question more in books than in practice."

As I gave the propositions of the gentleman from Ohio a first hasty reading, I concluded that he had not studied the question as a practical one, but in books only, though his propositions are vitally related to every detail and ramification of our industries. This judgment investigation and reflection have confirmed. The form of the resolution may be claimed by the gentleman, but its substance belongs to others. It would be an easy matter to assign each of his propositions to the British writer who propounded it, or who has given it prominence in discussion. There is not one of them that the senior members of the House will not recognize as a familiar acquaintance. Indeed, every one of them has during my congressional career been discussed by scores of gentlemen in this Hall. They are so many exploded fallacies, and the refutation of each and all of them may be drawn from our industrial experience or that of other nations. The assumption that underlies this remarkable production is that trade, which calls into ceaseless action the emotions and master passions of men, is regulated by laws as absolute as those of geometry. The laws which govern production, distribution, and consumption are not those of an exact science. "It is true," said Hamilton, "that in arithmetic two and two make four, but it is not true in trade and finance."

Let me state the propositions propounded by the gentleman. They are as follows:

First. A tariff is a tax upon imported goods, which is ultimately paid by the consumer, as the importer always adds to the selling price the amount of duty paid.

Second. A tariff for protection, so called, does not in most cases protect the interest it pretends to foster.

Third. A protective tariff does not increase the wages of workingmen.

Fourth. A protective tariff builds up one citizen at the expense of another, for every dollar of additional price that protection enables the manufacturer to charge must be paid by another citizen.

Fifth. A protective tariff disturbs the operation of the primal law of trade which governs all exchanges by the supply and demand of the articles to be exchanged.

Sixth. The present protective tariff has driven the American carrying trade from the high seas by enhancing the price of the materials which enter into the construction of vessels so that American shipbuilders cannot compete with foreigners engaged in the same business.

Seventh. A protective tariff increases the possibility of the crime of smuggling.

Eighth. A protective tariff shuts out the American manufacturer from the markets of the world. Our manufacturers need more an increase of market by which foreign capital can be brought into this country than protective legislation which takes money from one American pocket to put it into another.

The ninth paragraph is a statement of the means by which the gentleman would bring our tariff to a revenue standard. It will be regarded by practical men, whether merchants or manufacturers, as eminently illustrative of the author's want of knowledge of the relation of customs duties to the productive industries of his country.

Let us examine these propositions seriatim:

IS THE DUTY PAID BY THE CONSUMER?

Is the tariff on imported goods always paid by the consumer? Is it true that the importer always adds the amount of duty paid to the selling price of a commodity? As a proposition touching the goods imported into the United States, with few and marked exceptions, this proposition is absolutely untrue. Indeed, it can only be true, and not invariably there, in such free-trade, and consequently non-manufacturing countries as Turkey, India, and the South American States. In our country, France, Belgium, Germany, and Austria, which, by aid of the protective system, have developed the capabilities of their people and made the investment of capital in manufactures safe, the foreigner who finds a market for his wares in competition with those of like character of native production ordinarily pays the duty. The recent increase of Canadian duties elicited a pointed illustration of this general law. The duty on type had been 5 per cent. The new tariff law raised it to 20 per cent. Did the importers of type raise the price of their goods by imposing the increased duty on the consumer? No; for, seeing that increase of price might develop domestic production of type, they at once assumed the payment of the duty. The leading importing house, that of Miller & Richard, at once advised the printers of the Dominion by advertisement displayed in the commercial journals that "imported type would, notwithstanding the increase of duty, be sold at the old prices." Relative to this question is that of paper, every grade of which, whether for writing, printing, or wrapping, has been cheapened under protective duties.

A little reflection would, I think, have satisfied the gentleman that his first proposition is worse than a glittering generality, that it is a sophism calculated to mislead the ignorant and unthinking. Had he questioned himself as to its truth, it would probably have occurred to him that he who seeks a market for his goods must bear all charges, and that this law holds good in international as well as local trade. It is only when demand exceeds supply or the market is controlled by a foreign monopoly that duties can be imposed on the consumer of imported goods. The truth is that the primary dependence of the manufacturer is upon the home market of his country. In this market the producer and consumer are near to each other. Charges for transportation are consequently light, and as purchases may be made in accordance with the demands of the season, there is little loss of interest by either manufacturer or merchant from holding goods in stock for an uncertain demand. In purely domestic trade the interest charge on stock account is reduced to a minimum and the profits of middlemen are avoided.

Exports to manufacturing countries whose manufactures are adequately protected, except such articles as the importing country does not produce, are largely made on consignment by the manufacturer, and consist of goods produced for the home market, but which have been found to be in excess of its requirements. They are generally consigned to an agent who sells them at auction or otherwise irrespective of tariff regulations or of the question of profit or loss. His business is to sell the consignment, earn his commission, and promptly remit the proceeds of sale to his principal. When the spice crop exceeded the demand of the market, the Dutch maintained prices by burning the surplus. The foreign rivals of our manufacturers adopt a less expensive plan of maintaining prices in their home market; they throw the surplus of each spring and autumn upon the markets of a rival country. While thus interfering with the legitimate course of trade in the country to which they consign goods, they add what they receive for their consignments to the profits derived from the home trade regardless of the question of duties or even of that of price. They have realized the season's profit and now seek by damaging the market of a rival to avert a glut in their home market for the next year. This is not theory. It is but a statement of commercial practice, a law of international trade recognized by all merchants.

Under the ordinary conditions of trade we export but few manufactured commodities. The volume increases from year to year, but our exports of manufactured goods consist generally of specialties, in the production of which we excel all others. Our home market is the best in the world, and we have not the producing capacity to supply the wants of American consumers, as is attested by our immense consumption of foreign staple goods. Yet the expediency of unloading their surplus stock of goods in foreign markets is not unknown to our manufacturers and merchants. During the financial depression which followed the demonetization of silver by Germany and the United States and our enactment of a law to reduce the volume of our circulating Treasury notes to $300,000,000, our manufacturers, perceiving the steady diminution of their home market, and consequent decline of prices, sought relief from an export trade, and month by month announcements, sometimes official and always of a flaming character, were made of our increasing exports of manufactured goods. When leisure afforded opportunity, I sought many of the consignors of goods and found that they were availing themselves of the teachings of older nations and of ordinary commercial prudence. "No," said one of the most intelligent of them in response to my question as to whether the foreign market was a real one, "to force sales of our goods at home would be to further depress an already unremunerative market. We are making our losses abroad, and sharing them with those who usually supply the countries to which we ship, whether they be Germans, French, or English. We are sacrificing our goods where others will share our loss, instead of further depressing our own market." The truth of these statements was proven by the fact that with the renewal of our domestic trade our unusual export of American manufactures ceased.

CRUCIBLE-STEEL, SILK, AND BESSEMER RAILS.

The converse of my proposition is also true. He who sells goods for which there is an active demand may subject them to all charges. Many facts in our own history illustrate this side of the proposition. Let me allude to cast-steel, silk, and Bessemer rails as illustrations of this fact. Many attempts to establish the manufacture of cast-steel had been made in this country. They had cost the enterprising men who made them their fortunes. Calculating the cost of production, and taking the prices at which cast-steel then sold in their market, they saw room for a reasonable profit. But when they had constructed their works, gathered about them workmen, and put their product on the market, they found that the price had fallen; that their British competitors were selling at rates which were not only unremunerative but which might prove ruinous to them; and thus, after a brief struggle, they succumbed, not to fair competition under free trade or a revenue tariff, but, as I shall show, to a combination of foreign capitalists. The last signal failure of an American establishment for the production of cast-steel occurred in 1860. The Morrill tariff bill of 1861 and its supplements, passed under the exigencies of the war, imposed large duties on cast-steel. Under adequately protective duties it has come to be one of our well-established industries, and we supply from our own raw materials, converted by American tax-payers, to the manufacturers of every form of steel tool and implement as good steel as the world can produce; and it is a noteworthy fact that we supply it at lower prices than the same grade could be imported before the higher duties were imposed.

The same story may be told as to silk, except that its manufacture was attempted at a much earlier period than that of steel. It was, I think, Queen Caroline who, on the occasion of her coronation, wore a dress made of silk produced from American cocoons in the then loyal colony of Georgia; and from that time until 1861 ineffectual efforts to establish various branches of the silk industry in this country had been made. The financial exigencies of the war forced us to develop it. Silk goods were a luxury which the then Committee of Ways and Means believed the people would have at any price, and they imposed high rates of duty upon all forms of such goods. What has been the result? Silk has taken high rank among our industries. We may now speak of silk goods as among our great staple manufactures. Its establishment has created prosperous and beautiful towns and cities, chief among which stands Paterson, New Jersey. And while fashion may yield the palm of beauty of design to French goods, utility seeks assurance that the silk which is to grace the farmer's or mechanic's wife or daughter is of American production. In this case, as in that of cast-steel, price has receded as quality has improved.

In the matter of Bessemer steel the story, like unto those of cast-steel and silk, is all within my own memory. In 1865 small importations of Bessemer rails were made for use in the station-yards at Philadelphia of the Pennsylvania and the Philadelphia and Baltimore Railroads. The lowest price at which they could be imported was $150 per ton in gold. Enterprising proprietors of American iron-works counted the cost of producing Bessemer rails, and in view of the lowest price at which they could be bought, invested large sums of money in the purchase of the patents under which alone such rails could be produced, constructed works at Troy, New York, and at two points in Pennsylvania, and commenced the production of an article for which, guided by the price demanded by British producers, they supposed a fair market price was $150 per ton. They were, however, when they came to put their rails upon the market, met with the best quality of British rails at $120 a ton. Their fortunes were in the patents and their plant. They must find a market, and their first sales were made at $120 per ton. Their foreign rivals, with an enormous combination of capital, knew the value of the American market, and determined to retain it, and that, which before this competition arose they would not sell at less than $150 per ton, was now offered at $100. Embarrassment overtook two of our young establishments, and ruin overwhelmed the third. American genius was brought into requisition. The aid of the geologist and mining engineer was invoked, and while our mechanical engineers and artisans improved the processes for production the mining engineer reported stores of ore for spiegelheisen, for which we had hitherto depended on Germany, as abounding in the Appalachian range. But science and mechanical skill could not have vanquished the combined iron-masters of Britain. Another agency was needed, the protection of the Government to the labor and enterprise of its citizens. This was happily accorded.

The tariff was adjusted to the exigencies of the case; our manufacturers of rails were assured that they should have a fair chance in their own market if they would prepare the means of furnishing our railroad companies at reasonable prices an adequate supply of rails equal to the best foreign product. Under this guarantee of protection Bessemer works have multiplied and expanded, and the price of rails has been reduced to less than one-half of that which had ruled under a revenue tariff, and, as was shown by reports from some of the leading railroad companies of the country in the investigation of the subject by the present Committee on Ways and Means, the American rail almost invariably outlives its foreign rival. Thus, protection has enabled American citizens to resist an organized warfare upon them and their country's interest; and those who sanctioned what, superficially considered, seemed to be a tax on commodities they were to consume, find themselves rewarded a thousandfold by improvement of quality and reduction of price, and may indulge in a good degree of self-congratulation when they contemplate their further emancipation from the commercial thraldom in which the British Government and its organ, the Cobden Club, have hoped to hold the American people.

produced 1,203,173 net tons of ingots. How steady and rapid the increase of this production has been the annexed table shows:

	Tons.
1872	120,108
1873	170,652
1874	191,933
1875	375,517
1876	525,996
1877	560,587
1878	732,226
1879	928,972
1880	1,203,173

	Tons.
1872	94,070
1873	129,015
1874	144,944
1875	290,863
1876	412,461
1877	432,169
1878	550,398
1880	917,592

But these figures do not exhibit the total American production of Bessemer rails during 1880. Several mills hitherto engaged in producing iron rails have found it more profitable to purchase ingots and blooms of Bessemer steel for conversion into rails, and a recent number of the Bulletin of the Iron and Steel Association informs the trade that at least 50,000 net tons of rails were thus produced during the last year. It is now apparent that the production for 1881 will mark an immense advance upon that of 1880. Many of the eleven original works are enlarging their plant and improving their methods. The Vulcan Works at Saint Louis, after several years of idleness, were in full blast on the 1st of January. The Pittsburgh Bessemer Steel Company, Limited, is about commencing operations with a capacity of sixty thousand tons of ingots a year. The North Chicago Steel Company are pushing their works rapidly to completion, and the Colorado Coal and Iron Company are crowning the Rocky Mountains with Bessemer steel works and a mill for rolling rails, with which it is hoped to extend our railroad system, not only to the borders of Mexico, but to her capital.

If the gentleman would know whether the duty on cast-steel, silk, and Bessemer rails is paid by the consumer, let him consult the commercial journals which have for years recorded the daily price of those articles from 1860 to 1880, and he will find that they are all sold irrespective of the rate of duty and at prices lower than they commanded when the American people were wholly dependent on foreign markets for such goods.

"TARIFFS FOR REVENUE ONLY."

But, as these papers may not be accessible to the gentleman, I will furnish him with ample information as to the question of price and who pays the duty on Bessemer rails. That duty is $28 a ton. Before it was imposed, the lowest price at which British rail-makers would sell their goods for the American market was as I have said $150 gold a ton. What effect this duty has had upon prices is shown by the following table which has been carefully prepared by Mr. James M. Swank, the accomplished secretary of the American Iron and Steel Association:

Prices in dollars of American Bessemer steel rails, at works, from 1868 to 1880.—Tons of 2,240 pounds.

DOES THE REPEAL OF PROTECTIVE DUTIES REDUCE PRICES?

But the fallacy involved in the gentleman's proposition may be further illustrated by considering the question, "Does the removal of a duty from an import reduce its price to the American consumer?" Three instances of this kind in our recent experience have furnished evidence that it does not, and that in many instances the question of high or low duty or no duty has nothing to do with the price of imported commodities in our market. Before the reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United States, provincial coal paid a duty of $1.50 per ton. Under that treaty it was for more than ten years free. On the expiration of the treaty, the duty of $1.50 was revived. It was subsequently reduced to $1.25, and subsequently to fifty cents per ton. During all this period, through all these changes, the price of provincial coal in our market was regulated by that of American coal. It sold at our rates when paying the duty of $1.50 per ton. Under the treaty the mine-owner retained the duty, and sold his coal at our rates; and so since the expiration of the treaty the mine-owner or shipper of the coal has paid the duty, but has been unable to get any better prices than those current for American coal for that on which he has paid duty.

A fresher illustration is found under the Hawaiian treaty. When the question of approving the treaty was before this House in 1878, it was asserted by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and other advocates of the treaty, that the people of the Pacific coast would obtain the whole sugar crop of the Hawaiian Islands at the American market rate less the duty. But every gentleman from the Pacific coast will bear me witness that the hundreds of thousands of dollars which but for the treaty would have gone into the Treasury as duty on Hawaiian sugar have been retained by the Hawaiian producers who employ Chinese cheap labor.

A still more recent illustration of the truth I am considering comes to my mind. The duty on quinine was denounced for years by free-traders as a "blood tax." To retain the duty was to tax the sick and the dying for the benefit of a few monopolists; and in a furore, without discussion in either House, the duty was repealed. Now, I affirm, without fear of contradiction, that the repeal of the duty on quinine has not reduced its cost in a single case to an American consumer, but was a direct grant to foreign producers of that article of whatever sum the Government might have collected as duty upon it. The price of quinine is higher in our markets to-day than it was when the duty was repealed, or had averaged while our manufacturers were, under a protective duty, employing workmen in its production.

DO PROTECTIVE DUTIES PROTECT?

Is the gentleman's second proposition more tenable than the one we have just considered? It is that "a tariff for protection, so called, does not in most cases protect the interest it pretends to foster." If, as the gentleman asserts in his fourth proposition, the object of a tariff is to build up one citizen at the expense of another, I admit the truth of this proposition, and that our protective tariffs have been costly devices for enriching producers at the expense of consumers. But I affirm that such is not the object or effect of a protective tariff. The purpose and effect of such a tariff is to protect American citizens in the fair and reasonable enjoyment of the home market, and by doing this to develop the material resources of the country and the genius, tact, and industry of the people. The action of such a law being general, it cannot promote monopolies, but does invite free competition in the protected industry. When recapitulating the gentleman's propositions I failed to state—as I should have done—that he had appended to each of them a short "stump speech." I refer to the fact now, because I propose to refute the proposition under consideration by quoting part of the speech thereto appended. Here the gentleman says:

While at first it may bring large profits to those engaged in the manufacturing which is assumed to be protected, it soon, by these very profits, invites many persons into the business.

To this statement I assent. A protective tariff always promotes domestic competition, and thereby cheapens protected goods. But the gentleman does not stop here. He proceeds to say:

From which result overproduction, overstocking of the market, low prices, reduction of the hours of labor, shutting down, at least temporarily, of the workshops, embarrassment to the proprietor, and, in many instances, final bankruptcy, in which the large profits made at first are swallowed up, and the large wages at first paid workmen, if saved up at all, are consumed in waiting for a business revival, which, if it does come, will inevitably be attended by the same consequences.

In these suggestions the gentleman confounds causes which are absolutely independent of each other. He ascribes to the action of protective tariffs effects which were due to the unwise and unpatriotic legislation which repealed those laws after manufactures had been created and prosperous communities of industrious families been congregated about there. The terrible consequences he portrays are not due to protection but to the vacillation which characterized our legislation prior to 1861. No preceding decade of our industrial history was as free from such crises as he refers to as have been the twenty years since the passage of the Morrill tariff bill.

Were it the object or effect of a protective tariff to confer benefits on one class of citizens at the expense of another class, I would oppose such legislation with all my power; but, as the gentleman has declared, the effect of protective duties is to create new branches of domestic industry, which, if found to be profitable, soon invite others to engage in them and to give them permanence. Thus, as I have shown, it has been with cast-steel, silk, and Bessemer rails, and these are but illustrative cases of which hundreds might be presented. Perhaps the most striking in the world's history is that of beet-root sugar, which Bonaparte created by imposing duties on foreign sugar that made its importation almost impossible, and offering enormous bounties to those who should produce the most beets from an acre of French land, or the most sugar from a ton of French beets.

That industry is now a cardinal source of revenue to France, Germany, and other continental nations. It yields 50 per cent. of the world's supply of sweets; and had it not been created by the fostering care of the French Government no man can imagine the price sugar would now command, or the proportion of the people of Christendom who would have to forego the use of so expensive a luxury as it would be. In this connection is it not pertinent to inquire what would be the price of cast-steel, of silk goods, of Bessemer rails, were the world deprived of the supply created by American labor, and which could not have been created but for the beneficent influence of the protective tariffs which have prevailed during the last twenty years?

I have said that the gentleman in attempting to portray the effects of protection confounded causes, and ascribed to the protective system the ruinous consequences of the frequent alternations between protection and free trade which have been inflicted upon the people by democratic theorists. To assume that because those who under assurance of protection organized a new industry and found it profitable would cause an "overstocking of the market, low prices, reduction of the hours of labor, shutting down, at least temporarily, of the workshops, embarrassment to the proprietor, and in many instances final bankruptcy," &c., is to assume that the enterprising men of America are wanting in common sense and common prudence; and that on a mere show of a chance for profits, they will without investigating the markets or knowing the action of others in the same direction, risk their capital and character in rash experiments. Such incidents as the gentleman enumerates, in which the capital of discreet men has been swallowed up and their laboring people ruined, have occurred and will again occur whenever the legislation of the United States shall be confided, as it has too often been, to a Congress that will act upon the theories propounded by the gentleman. They can never be produced by a protective tariff. On this point I appeal confidently to American history.

AN APPEAL TO AMERICAN HISTORY.

The war of 1812 and the embargo laid by Britain's "orders in council," called into existence many workshops and small factories; but when the war closed there was no tariff for the protection of the capital embarked in these shops or the wages of the laborers they employed. Free trade and sailors' rights was the war-cry. During our colonial days the British Government had, by a succession of statutory provisions, prohibited to the colonists almost every form of manufacture, and now she saw her chance to reduce to commercial dependence the people of the States whose political independence she had been compelled to acknowledge. The treaty of peace was signed on the 24th of December, 1814, but it was not ratified until 1815, in which year Mr. Henry Brougham, afterward Lord Brougham, in the course of a speech in the House of Commons, appealed to the manufacturers of England to make the pecuniary sacrifice required to suppress the manufactures called into existence in the United States by the recent war. These were his words:

> The peace of America has produced somewhat of the same effect, though I am very far from placing the vast exports which it occasioned upon the same footing with those to the European market the year before, both because ultimately the Americans will pay, which the exhausted state of the continent renders very unlikely, and because it was well worth while to incur a loss upon the first exportation in order by the glut to stifle in the cradle those rising manufacturers in the United States, which the war has forced into existence contrary to the natural course of things.

The wealthy manufacturers of England were prompt to act on Brougham's suggestion, and in 1816 began a period of suffering and depression for the American people such as they had never experienced. Workshops were closed, and working people without employment were reduced to pauperism. The capital that had been invested in workshops and factories was lost, and enterprise saw no field in which it might profitably engage. From year to year things grew worse, and Cobbett, in his preface to Gouge on Banking, records the fact that in 1821 the best properties in Philadelphia, in which city he then lived, which were subject to mortgage or ground-rent, passed without additional consideration to the holder of the mortgage or the ground-rent, the tenant in fee being glad to escape the costs of suit and a judgment for arrears of interest or rent which might cloud his future life.

It was this long period of suffering that compelled Congress to give the American people the protective tariff of 1824, the effect of which on their social condition was little less than magical. Capital, assured by a protective tariff, of the local market, opened mines, relighted the fires in forge and furnace, set looms and spindles to work, and constructed factories larger than had ever existed in the country. So palpable were the beneficent effects of the tariff of 1824 that its rates were increased by the law of 1828 and its provisions extended to branches of industry which had come into existence during the intervening four years. The impulse given to production by this reassurance and extension of protection gave a new impulse to manufactures.

Immigration increased; capital accumulated and was quickly reinvested in manufactures. The country was prosperous and the revenues of the Government abundant. There was no "overstocking of the market;" prices did not fall so low as to force a "reduction of the hours of labor" or lead to "embarrassment to the proprietor;" nor were the wages of workingmen "consumed in waiting for a business revival." It was an era of unprecedented prosperity to the American people, in which workmen came to be employers and workshops expanded to the dimension of factories. The future was full of promise. The American system, as Mr. Clay had been pleased to call the protective policy, promised to secure commercial and financial independence to the country; but alas for that country! Calhoun and others, who then believed in the truth of the propositions propounded by my friend from Ohio, threatened nullification and disunion as the consequence of an attempt on the part of the Government to longer maintain and enforce its tariff laws. What followed we all know. To avert the possibility of war, Mr. Clay introduced his fatal compromise bill, by which duties were to be reduced 10 per cent. each year until they should reach what the free-trade party of the country were willing to recognize as a revenue standard.

Now came the consequences portrayed by the gentleman. Free trade did what he charges upon protection. Our markets were promptly flooded with foreign goods by British monopolists who were willing to make the sacrifice needed to secure the destruction of our prosperous and expanding industries; prices fell, factories were run for short hours, wages were reduced, factories were closed, bankruptcy overtook their proprietors, workmen were idle, prosperous industrial centers were converted into the abodes of idleness and aggregations of want, our specie was drawn from us in payment for foreign goods, our banks failed, the credit of the Government was destroyed. The administration of Mr. Tyler sent an agent, General William Robinson, of Pennsylvania, to England to negotiate certain credits which Congress had authorized, but returning disheartened he reported to the Government that he had been unable to find a banker who was willing to take the responsibility of putting on the market an American loan for even so small a sum as $2,500,000. I need not moralize on these facts.

How were the Government and people rescued from their deplorable condition? A bankrupt law relieved enterprise from the debts which overwhelmed it, and the protective tariff of 1842 rekindled the fires in forge and furnace, and cheered the spinner and weaver with the music of the spindle and the loom. The same happy effects resulted from the protective tariff of 1842 which had been produced by those of 1824 and 1828. It unhappily lasted but four years. The election of 1844 restored the democratic party to power, and though it had carried the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey by the cry of "Polk, Dallas, and the tariff of 1842," its first great congressional work was to supplant the protective tariff of 1842 by Robert J. Walker's revenue tariff, now known as the tariff of 1846, which went into effect in 1847.

The decade which followed that year was a memorable one. It gave us the gold of California, of which, in less than ten years, we mined $1,100,000,000. It was during that decade that we gave Europe the first intimation of our ability to supply whatever deficiency in food might occur throughout the world. The potato rot decimated Ireland, affected the other British Islands, and spread to the Continent of Europe, and we exported in one year the then unprecedented amount of sixty-eight million dollars' worth of grain. The gold of California and the famine which prostrated the Irish people swelled the tide of immigration to unwonted numbers, and yet our people were not prosperous. We imported and consumed immense quantities of foreign goods, and as the quantity of these increased the demand for the labor of American workmen diminished. We imported coal for use in manufactories and the propulsion of locomotives. We imported rails to lay over our coal-fields and iron-beds. Wages fell to rates as low as they had been in 1820 and 1821, or in 1840 and 1841. The $1,100,000,000 of California gold had fled from us as from a pestilence. We had nothing to show for our unusual exports of grain and provisions.

The resources of the Government were shrinking monthly, and its credit was again destroyed; and in a little less than ten years from the going into effect of the revenue tariff of 1846 the entire banking system of the country collapsed, the first great institution to fail having been the Ohio Life and Trust Company, and the second the Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, Bank. The application of the principles enunciated in the gentleman's resolution to the industries of a country of abounding prosperity had worked its inevitable result. The people were prostrated, idle, and discontented. The political and sectional agitation of the country was aggravated by the depressed condition of the people; and when the South determined to better its condition by war, their fellow-citizens of the North, to whom no field of enterprise or industry was open, said, "Be it so," and the war began.

I come now to my last illustration of the fact that it is not protection but free trade that works the direful influences portrayed by the gentleman. We have had twenty years of protection, during which we have grown in national importance as no nation ever grew; during which more has been done by art, science, and industry, to add to the dignity of our country and exalt it in the esteem of the world, to cement together its widely separated sections, and to secure prosperity alike to the individual citizen and the communities they constitute, than has been done in any other epoch of our history. It is true we had one period of depression during these twenty years. It began in 1873. But, sir, it did not result from protection. The tariff laws that prevailed during that dark period had prevailed for years. Under those laws, too, came the revival of business, and under them we are enjoying the boundless prosperity of to-day. And I may add that the stagnation was more intense and protracted in free-trade England than in protective America. We must, therefore, look outside of the protective policy for the cause of that world-wide commercial and industrial depression. As gentlemen on this floor all know, I find its cause in the combined action of Germany and the United States in an attempt to demonetize silver, and in the persistent effort that was made to reduce the volume of American legal-tender paper money then in use to $300,000,000. In proof of the correctness of this conclusion, I cite the fact that from the time we restored the silver dollar to the list of our coins, Germany abandoned her sales of silver, and we prohibited the Treasury from canceling any more of the legal-tender Treasury notes, the downward tendency in commercial circles ceased, and a new era of prosperity set in.

The tenor of the gentleman's resolution would lead one to suppose that he regards the question of free trade and protection as involving the whole of social science, and yet he once alludes to the effect of a change in the value of money; it is thus shown that he has a perception of the fact that the power to expand or contract the volume of money to which the business of a nation or the world has adjusted itself has a relation to wages, to productive industry, and to commerce. The protective policy has been a potent factor in the promotion of the greatness of England, France, Germany, and the United States; but it has occurred in the history of all these nations, save France, whose monetary policy is the wisest and most stable of those of modern nations, that alternating contraction and inflation of the currency has not only influenced but absolutely controlled their productive power. An expanding currency had brought prices to the figures of 1872–'73. A contracting currency, resulting from the action of Germany on the silver question and our concurrent legislation, produced the world-wide commercial crisis of 1873, and was responsible for the depression that increased in severity until we repealed our unfortunate legislation and Germany abandoned her sales of silver.

But if the gentleman will have it that the question of protection and free trade is the controlling factor in industrial science, I beg him to compare the prosperity of the past twenty years, including the years of depression, with the condition of our people under the revenue tariff of Robert J. Walker. Here was one decade of free trade, and the two which succeeded it in which the protective system prevailed. A careful study of these two periods will show the gentleman that I have referred him to a brief chapter of his country's history which will relieve him of all doubt as to the correctness of the aphorism that history is philosophy teaching by example.

DOES A PROTECTIVE TARIFF INCREASE WAGES?

The third proposition of the Hurd resolution is that a protective tariff does not increase the wages of workingmen. If this proposition be not an absurdity, there is no truth in the doctrine asserted, correctly, as I think, by all free-traders, that the price of commodities is controlled by the law of demand and supply. If a protective tariff leads to the increase and diversification of employment, it must increase the demand for labor and diminish the supply. Not only do protective duties do this, but they often open the means of honorable subsistence to those who, having aptitude for delicate handicrafts, have not the physical strength and endurance required for the rough labor of the field or the workshop. The introduction of a new industry inevitably furnishes work and wages to men, women, or children employed in extracting hitherto unused raw materials from the earth or gathering them from swamp or forest and converting them into things of use or beauty. To this extent it increases the demand for labor. Thus is the laborer strengthened in his demand for increase of wages.

My apology for detaining the committee by referring to these palpable truisms is that the gentleman's resolution is predicated on the assumption that they are false. Why are the laborers of the North generally so much more intelligent than those of the South? Why are they so much more comfortably housed, appareled, and fed? How account for that superior degree of self-respect and personal bearing which characterizes them? Sir, I affirm, without fear of intelligent contradiction, that the answer to all these questions is "because twenty consecutive years of the protective policy have so diversified the industries of the North that whatever special gift with which any may have been endowed finds ready employment, and commands wages according to its degree of value." How may the wages of labor be increased if it be not by increasing and diversifying the demand for it? Without a protective tariff the almost exclusive business of the American people would be the production of raw materials for exportation for fabrication in foreign countries.

Again, sir, diversified industries furnish employment for every day in the year, while persons engaged exclusively in agricultural pursuits cannot be continuously employed. To them the long winter, except as to the brief hours required to feed stock, is a waste. There is a season for planting, the seasons for tilling, and the harvest season. During these periods the farmer's duties are exacting, and his labor exhausting. But though he is necessarily idle much of the time while his fields are frozen, and during long spells of wet weather, there is nothing in his vocation to call forth any special gift with which Providence may have endowed him. Contrast the dire monotony of the life of an agricultural laborer with that of a keen artisan in a manufacturing town, where each person is in daily contact with others, and where emulation, whether it be in the pursuit of higher position in the factory, or aspiration to the ownership of a home, or of distinction or profit as an inventor or operative more skilled than his fellows, gives zest to each day's life.

I affirm that the great industries alluded to, the production of steel, silk, and Bessemer rails, are the legitimate offspring of the protective system; and will the gentleman assert that the wages of the American laborer or mechanic would be better if these industries had not been developed in our midst? Will he look at the great iron and steel works in and around Terre Haute, Indiana, and say that the wages of labor or the value of farm land and farm products in Clay and the adjoining counties of that State would have been as high as they are had not the tariff protection of the last twenty years enabled the owners of the carboniferous deposits of those counties to find a near market for their, until then, unrecognized mineral treasures? Will he say that the wages of labor in Indiana, Michigan, and Missouri would be greater than they now are had not a protective tariff created such a demand for American iron and steel as to justify the carrying of the rich ores of the Marquette and Escanaba regions of Michigan and the Iron Mountain of Missouri to the coal-fields of Indiana for smelting and conversion into rails and a thousand other useful forms?

Has the employment of the thousands of men engaged in mining this ore and the coal and limestone with which to fuse it tended to the reduction of the wages of labor in what we of Philadelphia know as the Western States? Does the gentleman know that the long trains of heavily freighted cars that carry ore to Indiana to be smelted near her coal-fields return freighted with fuel from that region to the furnaces and forges of the iron regions of Michigan and Missouri, or will he assert that the construction of the railroads by which these raw materials are concentrated at the several points of conversion has tended to diminish wages? Sir, who will say that the absorption of an army of men by the railroad service has not enlarged the demand for, diminished the relative supply of, and thus enhanced the price of labor?

Again let me recommend the gentleman to hold a little free conversation with those gentlemen upon the floor of this House who represent the iron regions of Alabama and Georgia and learn from them whether every Bessemer rail mill in the Northern States is not a customer of those of his constituents who own what is believed to be the richest deposit of spiegeleisen-ore in the world. Here again the collateral value of established and diversified industries is shown in the demand they create for increased means of transportation, and the proprietors of the railroads connecting the district of my friend from Alabama [Mr. FORNEY] with Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, and New England will attest the value of the business afforded by the carrying of raw materials from the field of production in Alabama to the places of conversion.

Were our workshops on the other side of the Atlantic, as the party which favors a tariff for revenue only would have them, our transportation companies would carry little other freight than finished products, and the immense revenues they now derive from the carrying hither and thither of raw materials would be lost to the companies and the country. So, too, would the earnings of the thousand of locomotive builders, engineers, firemen, and laborers who are now at work for them. Sir, until the gentleman can show that the price of an article is depreciated by increasing the demand for it, he cannot demonstrate the truth of his assertion that a protective tariff does not increase the wages of workingmen.

PROTECTIVE TARIFFS PROMOTE THE INDEPENDENCE OF WOMEN.

The services of men only are in this country required in mining, smelting, constructing, and operating railroads, and in kindred industries which have resulted from the protection our tariff laws have given to the producers of iron and steel. Happily the blessings conferred by the protective system are not confined to able-bodied or masculine laborers. There are among the women of America daughters who would gladly relieve their parents of their support, and contribute to the subsistence of the family. There are widows dependent on their own exertions, too often not for themselves alone, but for the support and education of their orphan children. There are orphan girls with younger brothers and sisters for whom they would gladly toil; and by giving infinite diversity to our productions, the protective system has provided employment, always honorable, and often highly remunerative, to these classes. In non-manufacturing countries they would all be dependent, or be driven to compete with men in the roughest, most severe, and least compensated fields of labor, as do British women and those of Belgium, Germany, and other continental States.

I have spoken of the beautiful city of Paterson as a creation of the silk tariff, and I recur to it to illustrate the great truth I am now pressing upon the attention of the committee. Having noted the extraordinary growth of Paterson, I some days since addressed a note to my friend the senior partner of the firm of William Strange & Co., ribbon manufacturers of that city, asking for definite information on certain points. His reply came promptly, and was as follows:

DEAR SIR: In reply to your questions, I would state that we have at present in Paterson fifty-eight establishments engaged exclusively in the manufacture of silk in its various branches, four extensive silk-dyeing establishments, three silk finishing establishments, one harness and reed-maker establishment, and five card-stampers and designers. These employ in round numbers 12,500 operatives, at an annual cost in wages of $4,164,000; and the capital invested in mills and machinery amounts to between nine and ten millions of dollars.

In addition to the above, we have $125,000 invested in mills and machinery exclusively employed in the manufacture of silk machinery, bobbins, swifts, and other articles used in the production of silk goods. About seven hundred mechanics are employed in these branches of industry, at an annual expenditure in wages of about five hundred thousand dollars.

The population of Paterson, as per census of 1860, was 19,586; in 1870 it had increased to 33,579, and in 1880 to 50,950.

Among the direct benefits which have been conferred by the establishment of the silk industry upon our city, may be mentioned the universally-admitted fact that during the panic of 1873, when almost every other branch of industry was paralyzed, it continued to find remunerative employment for its operatives, and saved many others from starvation and despair who, for want of an outlet for their own labor in other branches, found themselves dependent for the means of subsistence upon the earnings of their wives and children, who were employed in the silk mills of Paterson. It has also been reasonably credited with protecting the general business interests of the city from the ruin which threatened it during that long period of distress and anxiety.

Paterson, however, has not been the only recipient of direct benefit from the energy and enterprise of her silk manufacturers, as may be instanced in the erection of important branch establishments by Dester, Lambert & Co., at Hawley, Pennsylvania, the Phœnix Manufacturing Company at Allendale, Pennsylvania, and the Myenberg at Hoboken, New Jersey, and others, which shows that notwithstanding the rapid growth of our city it has not kept up with the requirements and wonderful expansion of the silk industry.

One of the most commendable features of this industry to the community at large, is the opportunity it affords for the employment of female labor, as evidenced by the fact that at least two-thirds of the work performed in our silk mills is executed by that class of operatives.

Our productions are now equal in quality, and in many instances surpass those of foreign manufacture. We have even been complimented as well as injured by the adoption of our brands and trade-marks by our transatlantic competitors for the purpose of facilitating the sales of their fabrics.

These are but a few of the returns which have been made by the silk manufacturers of Paterson to their countrymen for the benefits which they have received from the adequate protection which Congress has conferred upon them.

Paterson is an old settlement, yet it will be seen that the census of 1860 found it with less than 20,000 inhabitants, while that of 1880 found it with very nearly 51,000. And, notwithstanding this remarkable growth, it has, as Mr. Strange tells us, offshoots at different points in Pennsylvania and New Jersey. I am confident the gentleman will not have the temerity, in the face of these facts, to assert that that which has created this demand for American labor, and opened such delicate and remunerative sources of employment to women, has not benefited the laboring classes, and that a tariff which works such effects does not increase the wages and improve the condition of working people.

But what has been the effect of the creation of this industry at Paterson upon the farmers of the neighborhood? To them these fifty thousand thrifty people look for spring vegetables, summer fruits, milk, butter, eggs, poultry, lamb, veal, and other articles, which, while they will not bear transportation to distant markets in such quantities as the small farmer can produce, give splendid remuneration for the care his wife and daughters bestow upon their production and preparation for market. Every such an industrial center that a protective tariff creates by developing and defending an industry is a boon to the farmer; and no class of our citizens share the benefits of a protective tariff more largely than farmers whose lands lie within a limited distance of a manufacturing town or city. They feel the effect of such a tariff, not only in the demand for articles which but for a near market would go to waste, but for those which they cultivate or raise specially for such markets; and, beyond this, in the enhanced price of the acres from which they derive an income, which ordinary farm products would not yield. But the point to which I wished to invite special attention in this connection is the manner in which a tariff that is broad enough to diversify our industries promotes the independence of women.

In the stump speech the gentleman appended to the proposition under consideration, he says "that in Germany, where there is a protective tariff, the wages are lower than in countries without a tariff or with a tariff for revenue only." Is this true? With all my respect for his general intelligence I cannot believe it. Can he tell whether wages in Germany are not as low as they are because the empire, elated by its victory over France and seduced by the enormous war fine it collected, repealed the protection theretofore secured to its laborers by the Zollverein? Will he tell me what effect the demonetization of silver has had upon the price of German wages and commodities? Until he disposes of these questions he cannot charge that the protective tariff which was re-enacted in the autumn of 1879 brought the manufacturers of Germany into trouble and reduced the wages of their laborers to the rates now paid.

But, sir, let what cause or causes may have produced this unhappy result, I deny that wages are lower in Germany than they are in Ireland, Turkey, India, the South American States, or any other country which, being without a protective tariff, suffers under the curse of British free trade.

In this connection the gentleman also says that in England, since the policy of free trade has been adopted, the wages of laborers have been higher than when the system of protection prevailed. If this be true, which I deny, it would not prove that we should abandon the protective system, or that free trade would promote the interests of any class of our citizens. The situation of England is peculiar, and contrasts with ours as diametrically as the situation and interests of two nations can. England is the only nation in the world whose manufacturers are dependent on a foreign market; while we cannot manufacture enough to supply the demands of our people. England cannot feed her own people. She looks to other countries for all forms of food that will bear transportation across the sea, and spends $10,000,000 annually on imported poultry and eggs. We, though we consume 90 per cent. of our farm products, can furnish her with adequate stores of wheat, corn, and rye; of beef, pork, mutton, cheese, green and dried fruits, and other elements of subsistence. Amply stored with coal, iron-ore, limestone, and salt, as she is, England is deficient in raw materials. For these she depends on foreign countries. Not so with us. Our stores of raw materials are unmeasured. The man does not live who can estimate their variety and extent. They embrace every element of manufactures which may be found in the temperate regions of the world. That which can be produced only in tropical regions, or like cryolite is found alone in the arctic regions, we must import, but all else we can produce. Foreign trade is essential to the life of England. She must sell manufactures enough to procure the means wherewith to purchase food and materials; hence she strives to cheapen commodities to such a point that in the markets of non-protected nations she may undersell the world. Low wages are to her a necessity. She cannot consider the condition of her working classes. If she cannot sell in foreign markets, she cannot give her workers employment, wages, or food. Not so with us. Were the oceans that separate us from other lands oceans of flame, the American people could live in the enjoyment of all the essential comforts of life they now enjoy. None of them would suffer for the want of food or raiment or of homes so well appointed as to supply not only the wants of the inmates but to gratify their desires and æsthetic tastes. Yes, thus after a score of years of liberal protection our manufactures have been so developed and our love of the beautiful so trained and disciplined that while England, were her coasts surrounded by hostile fleets, might starve, we, under similar circumstances, could go on prospering and to prosper.

The economic laws demanded by England's wants are not applicable to our case. Our working people are a part of the body-politic. Into the hands of their children will soon pass the destinies of our country, and we must see to it that our industrial system is so ordered that the sentiment of home and family shall be cherished by every citizen; that schools shall be opened for the children of the whole nation, and that while toiling to give them the benefits of school and church, parents may still be able to lay up from year to year that which will protect them in age from dependence upon the public or their children. I will not wrangle with the gentleman over the scale of British wages, or of the work demanded from the British laborer, but will beg him to consider the following sketch of an English blacksmith which I found in the recent letter of a regular correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph. It is an interview with a woman blacksmith, whose lot is such as God forbid that any American mother may ever be doomed to endure. Yet her lot does not appear to be the hardest among English wives. She is a nail-maker, and pronounced her trade "almost as bad as chain-making." My friend will perceive that in justification of her assertion that her lot was not the hardest known to English workingwomen she advised the correspondent to visit Cradley and learn by observation whether the lot of the English wives and mothers who were engaged in chain-making was not more deplorable than hers. But let her speak for herself and tell the gentleman something about the adequacy of the wages laborers receive in free-trade England:

A WOMAN BLACKSMITH—ONE OF THE SIGHTS OF THE BLACK COUNTRY OF ENGLAND.

At one forge later on, between nine and ten o'clock in fact, I discovered a female nailer working under disadvantages that might have daunted an anchor smith. Whether she had a husband whose absence was accounted for by his being addicted to beer-shop fogging, or whether she had no husband, I did not ask her, and she did not tell me. Anyhow, she was working alone, and she spoke of having "all these brats" to provide for, as though the whole responsibility rested on her poor narrow shoulders, the bones of which were so sharp that they threatened to cut through the flimsy material that covered them every time she tugged at the heavy bellows. There were four little children, the oldest about seven, the youngest a baby in "long clothes"—in a calico bed-gown, in fact, and nothing else. This solitary article of raiment had once been white, but was now approaching the complexion of a coal-sack.

The two children who came between the eldest and the youngest were disporting in the ashes, and pummeling each other's awfully dirty little bodies in a fierce struggle for the mangled remains of a wooden doll. There was only its carcass left, and its hair was singed off its head, and the paint on its face all scorched and blistered; but the two infant nailers could not have fought for it more ferociously had it been the choicest prize in Mr. Cremer's collection. The other two children—the oldest and the youngest, the former acting the part of nurse to the latter—were deposited in a kind of wooden cradle, that shared with a bellows the hearth where the fire was. The baby was shrieking, and the boy was shouting out a hymn in a vain endeavor to quiet it.

One way and another, the mother, poor soul—she was quite a young woman—seemed well-nigh distracted as she banged away at her work, bent seemingly on getting some set task done; the perspiration streamed down her face as though she was crying. She stuck to her work, however, and kept the sparks flying—showers of them besprinkled the occupants of the cradle, but without producing the least effect on those young salamanders—until a shriller shriek than hitherto caused the woman to throw down her hammer and take the child on her lap as she sat down on the nose of the anvil.

"Hard work?"

"It is just that, master," she remarked, in reply to an observation of mine; "and often I wish I was in heaven, and out of it all, 'pon my soul and body, I do; I raley get so sick of it!"

And as she took the sooty handkerchief from her head and wiped her wet face with it, a milder form of asseveration would have satisfied me of the probability of the change suggested being to her advantage. It was in vain she tried to pacify the squalling child at her lean bosom.

"Hush, then, and mammy'll spare a penny for half a pint of beer presently, and then, perhaps, she'll tuckle down a bit," said the poor soul, as protesting against the mockery offered it, the little rebel stiffened itself out and refused either to unbend or leave off shrieking.

"Haven't I got no help in working for 'em all? No, master, I've got no help. How much can I earn? Well, it's right-down slavery to earn a penny an hour at it. More often, especially when this young un o'mine is cross—it isn't more than ninepence for the whole day. No; we don't live quite on that, sir; I'm 'lowanced two loaves a week, but it's nigh on four miles to fetch 'em, so I don't know, reckoning the loss of time, that I'm much richer after all. I'm sure I don't know what's coming to the work, and the price they're giving for it. It's almost as bad as chain-making."

"Is that worse than nail-making?"

"For the women it is. Just you go to Cradley and ask 'em."

It was too late to follow her advice that night, but I did so next day.

DOES A PROTECTIVE TARIFF TAX ONE CITIZEN FOR THE BENEFIT OF ANOTHER?

We come now to the gentleman's fourth proposition, which is as follows:

A protective tariff builds up one citizen at the expense of another, for every dollar of additional price protection enables the manufacturer to charge must be paid by another citizen.

I do not doubt that the gentleman really believes this proposition. He was so taught at college. The authors of the text-books he then used affirm the proposition as confidently as he does; and it is evident that he has never consulted the writings of his great countrymen, Stephen Colwell and Henry C. Carey. Yet, if it be true, what becomes of the averments the gentleman made in support of his second proposition, that a tariff for protection results in overproduction, overstocking of the market, and low prices? In support of that proposition he tells us that the further effect of a protective tariff is embarrassment to the proprietor to the extent, in many instances, of final bankruptcy and to the ruin of the workingmen employed in protected factories, and all this because such a tariff reduces prices. Surely they who by overstocking the market reduce prices to such points as to involve themselves and their workingmen in ruin cannot be burdening with additional price the consumers of their productions. The gentleman's second and fourth propositions will not stand together; indeed, they flatly contradict each other; and yet I cannot ask him to choose between them, as each is in itself essentially false. He is one of the best lawyers in this House, and as a lawyer will not withhold homage from the learning, powers of investigation, painstaking industry, or cool judgment of Sir John Byles, author of Byles on Bills, and for many years a justice of the court of common pleas of England. This profound thinker and distinguished jurist devoted himself not to jurisprudence alone. Political economy has been one of his favorite studies, and it is nearly half a century since, in endeavoring to stay the free-trade fanaticism of Britain, he published a volume under the title of Sophisms of Free Trade and Popular Political Economy. The ninth revised British edition of this volume now before me appeared in 1870. Through how many editions it may have gone in the mean time in that country I do not know, nor can I tell how many our countryman, Henry Carey Baird, has published; but this I do know, that for many years the book has been widely read in this country. I propose to draw from it my exposition of the absurdity of the proposition we are now considering. The gentleman from Ohio submits it as a principle which should govern the American Congress. Sir John Byles presents it as a sophism which should be exposed, because its acceptance by any nation would be destructive to its best interests:

CHAPTER XXVII.

Don't tax the nation for the benefit of a producing class. Take care of the consumer and let the producer take care of himself.

The maxims of our ancient and successful policy were very different.

A nation, whether it consume its own products or with them purchase from abroad, can have no more value than it produces. The supreme policy of every nation, therefore, is to develop the producing forces of its own country. What are they? The workingmen, the land, the mines, the machinery, the water-power, &c.

Our fathers said: "Whatsoever you do, be sure you take care to develop the producing forces of your own country. The gain of doing this will be so immense that it will present the nation with an ample fund, not only sufficient to pay the tax on consumers of which you complain, but after having paid it still superabounding and leaving in the hands of the nation for its own spending a surplus ten times as great as that tax. Nay, the very tax itself will in most cases soon disappear; for the development of your own producing power will not only, at first and at once, bring plenty and riches, but in the end will bring a steady cheapness too, and along with that cheapness the powers of purchasing. It will add accessibility to cheapness."

So reasoned Cromwell, Lord Chatham, Sir Robert Walpole, Edmund Burke, Peter the Great, Colbert, Napoleon. So at this day reason France, Belgium, Russia, Germany, America, and, unfortunate for us, Canada and Australia, too.

Our fathers and we, the children, must, however, both cordially agree in this: The more a nation produces the richer it is.

Indeed, this seems a self-evident proposition. Without production of value you can neither consume nor buy. Ex nihilo nihil fit. Every increase of domestic production is an addition of so much wealth and so much of the means of purchase; any diminution of domestic production is a subtraction of so much wealth and of so much of the means of purchase.

We, the children, however, now seem unconsciously to assume that the amount of production in a country (the land, the men, and the actual property remaining the same) is an unvarying quantity. But the fathers thought that (the land, the men, and the actual property of a country remaining the same) that country will produce infinitely more, or infinitely less, according as certain regulations, favorable to domestic production and internal exchange, are present or absent.

Produce within your own dominions what you formerly imported from abroad, and your land, labor, and capital produce what they otherwise would not have produced. They still produce the articles which might have been used to purchase the new domestic product just as much as they did before. But, over and above this, they now produce the whole value of the new domestic product. Tried by the rule that the more a nation produces the richer it is, you are now the richer. You have now developed a new producing power of the country, which otherwise, instead of being developed, would have been stifled and smothered by foreign imports perhaps a little cheaper. By a sacrifice, it may be of 1 per cent., not the producers but the nation have gained the other 99. To pay your tax of one pound you are presented with a new and additional net income of a hundred pounds; and what you have done other nations may also do. The producing power of all the earth may thus be effectually developed, and yet, as we have seen in chapters VI and X, ample scope be everywhere left for foreign trade and international exchanges.

* * * * * * * * *

* * * But the children are not yet silent. They say, "It is the producers that gain, while the consumers lose." Again the fathers rejoin, "You are wrong in marshaling the nation into two hostile camps of producers and consumers. Not only is every producer a consumer who is not either a producer or else, living entirely out of the income of a producer, standing or falling with him." Laborers, farmers, manufacturers are all clearly producers. The landlords derive all their rent from the revenue of producers; so, of course, do the mortgagees, to whom they pay interest. The professional man is ultimately paid by producers; so is the fundholder himself and the public servant, too. Find, if you can, a living man who is not either a producer or maintained by a producer. Whatever, therefore, furthers the interest of producers not only benefits them, but also augments the common fund from which every consumer derives his income; and, on the other hand, whatever ruins or injures producers ruins or injures the common fund on which all consumers depend. * * * Reflect, and you will find that the wise and really gainful policy is not that which prematurely grasps anyhow at cheapness, but that which develops the producing power of the country. Our fathers, therefore, were right and we are wrong. They knew how to grow rich nationally as well as individually. We have seen how their theory has everywhere been justified by experience in time past here and elsewhere. It is still justified in America, in France, in Germany, in Russia.

DOES PROTECTION CONTRAVENE THE LAW OF SUPPLY AND DEMAND?

Leaving the gentleman to reconcile the contradictions of his second and fourth propositions, and to reply to the argument of Sir John Byles, I pass to the fifth proposition of his resolution, which is as follows:

A protective tariff disturbs the operation of the primal law of trade which governs all exchanges by the supply and demand of the articles to be exchanged.

To this assertion I offer a flat denial. It is not true. History contradicts it—our own history and that of other nations. England will not permit an unprotected people to enjoy free trade between themselves even in domestic productions, or to manufacture their own raw materials. Had the Congress of 1812-'14 enacted a tariff adequately protective of the industries which the war was calling into existence, Parliament would have appealed in vain through Henry Brougham to the British manufacturers to incur a loss upon the first exportation and thus by a glut to stifle those industries in the cradle.

Such a protective tariff instead of disturbing would have maintained the primal laws of trade, and enabled the American people to proceed in the work of developing the producing forces of their country, and to thus create a capital with which they might soon under the law of supply and demand enter freely into the exchanges of the world. This appeal of Brougham's and the quick and effective response made to it by the capitalists of Great Britain, were not exceptional facts. This course of enslaving younger and poorer nations, preventing the development of their resources, destroying the freedom of their trade, is part of the established policy of British capitalists, and has at all times had the sanction of that oppressor of mankind, the British Government. This policy is not only applied to strictly foreign nations but British colonies, which carry the English language, laws, and habits to remote points, and build up great communities, are subjected to it, and, but for protective tariffs, would be its victims as absolutely as are Ireland, India, Turkey, Egypt, the South American States, and Japan.

In this connection I commend to the attention of the gentleman from Ohio a little work now before me, entitled Outlines of an Industrial Science, by David Syme. Mr. Syme is an Englishman who emigrated many years ago to Australia. Editing a leading journal of the colony, he has been a frequent and thoughtful contributor to the periodical literature of England. It was in one of the great magazines of London that I first met his name. Many of his essays have been reproduced in this country, and the edition of his book now before me bears the imprint of Henry Carey Baird & Co., Philadelphia. He went to Australia a believer in the assumptions of free-trader, but the necessities of his new country soon demonstrated to him that the only way to make her trade free was to protect her producers by an adequate system of duties against the unfair use of British capital in the strangling of its infant industries by the production of gluts in Australian markets. I prefer that he shall answer this proposition of the gentleman to attempting a reply in language of my own. When discussing the question of competition as a means of securing freedom of trade, Mr. Syme says:

Even England, notwithstanding her free-trade proclivities, indirectly does all that she can to prevent any real competition with her on the part of other countries, and to this end her immense resources are used with crushing effect. At present she practically enjoys a monopoly of many lucrative branches of manufacture. With her natural advantages in coal and iron, with her acquired advantages of being the first in the field, and of having a numerous body of well-trained artisans, and, above all, of the immense capital at her disposal, she would be able to maintain her manufacturing supremacy as long as the rate of wages is not materially increased. Her only danger lies in this direction. "Dear labor," says Mr. Brassey, in Work and Wages, "is the greatest obstacle to the extension of British trade." Hence the extreme solicitude displayed by the trading classes of England at the present day on the question of wages; hence, also, the growing antagonism which has sprung up of late years between them and the wages-earning class.

The manner in which English capital is used to maintain England's manufacturing supremacy is well understood abroad. In any quarter of the globe where a competitor shows himself who is likely to interfere with her monopoly, immediately the capital of her manufacturers is massed in that particular quarter, and goods are exported in large quantities and sold at such prices that outside competition is effectually crushed out. English manufacturers have been known to export goods to a distant market and sell them under cost price for years with a view to getting the market into their own hands again. The modus operandi is incidentally explained with much naïveté in a report published some years ago by order of the House of Commons. "The laboring classes generally," says the author of this report, "in the manufacturing districts of this country, and especially in the iron and coal districts, are very little aware of the extent to which they are often indebted for their being employed at all to the immense losses which their employers voluntarily incur in bad times in order to destroy foreign competition and to gain and keep possession of foreign markets. Authentic instances are well known of employers having in such times carried on their works at a loss amounting in the aggregate to three or four hundred thousand pounds in the course of three or four years. If the efforts of those who encourage the combinations to restrict the amount of labor and to produce strikes were to be successful for any length of time, the great accumulations of capital could not then be made which enable a few of the most wealthy capitalists to overwhelm all foreign competition in times of great depression, and thus to clear the way for the whole trade to step in when prices revive and to carry on a great business before foreign capital can again accumulate to such an extent as to be able to establish a competition in prices with any chance of success. The large capitals of this country are the great instruments of warfare (if the expression may be allowed) against the competing capital of foreign countries, and are the most essential instruments now remaining by which our manufacturing supremacy can be maintained." That, I have no doubt, is a very fair, as it is certainly a very candid, statement of the manner in which English capital is used to crush out foreign competition.

"This," adds Mr. Syme, "I have no doubt is a very fair, as it is certainly a very candid statement of the manner in which English capital is used to crush out foreign competition." The report from which he made this extract was that of the parliamentary commission appointed in 1854 to examine into the state of the population of the mining districts.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, that commission uttered the truth when it declared that the large capitals of England are the great instruments of warfare by which the competition of foreign countries is crushed by British monopolists; and the nation which would secure to its people the right to develop its resources and trade freely among themselves can do so only by giving those people the benefit of rates of duty which will in seasons of commercial depression adequately protect them against the warfare of banded monopolists acting under the sanction of the British Government.

The Morrill tariff gave this mode of warfare its first real American repulse. Its supplements have driven the invaders from our borders. But these British monopolists do not abandon the hope of destroying their American rivals. They have adopted new methods and now employ the pen and professorial office. They hope to persuade us to surrender. Under the name of the Cobden Club they have an organization which embraces in its membership more than two hundred members of Parliament and twelve of the fourteen members of the present British Government. This club, composed as it is so largely of members of the British Government and their parliamentary supporters, has assumed the duty of teaching the American people political economy and entered without concealment into our last political campaign. In a letter prepared by Mr. Augustus Mongredien, which it circulated in this country at its own cost and under its own stamp, it appealed to the farmers of the United States to pledge themselves in advance to unite with the gentleman from Ohio, his party, and the banded capitalists of England in making war upon the industries of the United States and the wages of the laborers they employ. Said this impudent intermeddler in our domestic politics, after attempting by falsehood and misrepresentation to incense the farmers against the manufacturers of our country, "every farmer should hold this language to the candidates for Congress:"

I will only vote for you if you will vote for me, and voting for me means voting in the House for a reduction of 5 per cent. every successive year on the import duties until the whole are abolished.

Sir, I am a protectionist because I am an American. I am for maintaining the independence of my country and the welfare of my countrymen against all comers. I would protect them against the insidious arts of combined capital at the same cost, if need be, that I would against a foreign army or navy. But happily they may be defended without cost by the imposition of such duties on foreign imports as will insure the development of the producing forces of the country, "the men, the lands, the machinery, and the water power." This peaceful defense will, if maintained, enrich the nation and improve the condition of all its people, by giving them the advantage of "cheapness and accessibility." It is, I reiterate, not true that a protective tariff disturbs the operation of the primal laws of trade. Such a tariff is, in view of the enormous capital of England, and the oppressive manner in which it is combined and used, the only means of securing to the American people the benefit of the primal laws of trade.

IMMIGRATION—ITS SOURCES AND VALUE.

Before I pass from the consideration of this point, let me say that the leading position in the family of nations which our country has so suddenly assumed, is due more largely to our adherence to the protective policy during the last twenty years than to any other single cause. By enabling us to diversify our industries this policy has offered occupation and wages to skilled men in a thousand employments unknown to us prior to 1860. By enabling us to offer more liberal wages than any of our competitors, it has invited a stream of immigration the magnitude of which is alarming the governments of the manufacturing nations of the world. Canada invites British immigrants. The British Government, anxious to build up its American dominion, promotes British migration to Canada; but Canada adhered to the policy of free trade until quite recently; consequently she cannot offer work and wages to skilled hands. Some two years ago she professed to adopt the system of protection, and fashioned a tariff, the object of which appears to be not so much to develop her resources as to exclude American productions, when they might compete with those of the British Islands; but despite the efforts of her government and that of England, she cannot induce skilled workmen to remain within her limits.

During the last six months of the year just passed we received more than 278,000 immigrants, aliens who came to make this country their permanent residence. From Canada came 73,000, not on a sudden impulse, but as part of a steady flow of immigration thence to this country. Germany, too, gave us more than 73,000 of her subjects, skilled, many of them, in agriculture, and many of them in the mechanic arts. From among the farmers and skilled workingmen of England and Wales came nearly thirty-five thousand, while poor, down-trodden, and oppressed Ireland, impoverished as her people are, was able to pay the passage of nearly thirty thousand of her children. From Scotland came 7,000, while other countries, including Austria, Sweden, France, and Switzerland sent us nearly sixty thousand.

If our protective tariff is an oppressive wrong, why do these people fly in such hordes to bear its burdens and endure its wrongs? If free trade be a blessing, why do Englishmen, Welshmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen fly by tens of thousands from its blessings to bear the curse of American protection? Like the gentleman from Ohio, they have all heard the teachings of the Cobden Club and other free-trade organs of England; but unlike him, they have open eyes, they see the poverty and ignorance to which British free trade dooms her working people, and contrast their own condition with that of those of their countrymen who have preceded them as immigrants. These they learn are well fed, able to eat meat every day in the week and every week in the year; are well clothed, living in communities in which the foreign observer, on Sunday or other holiday, cannot, as was so often remarked by international visitors during the centennial year, distinguish between the laboring and the capital class by the apparel they wear or their bearing in public. "Where are your working people?" was a question pressed by thousands of intelligent observers during that year. They could not comprehend the fact that the working classes of a country could live in such homes as were indicated as those of the working classes of Philadelphia, or wear such apparel as did the thousands of workmen they met daily in the great halls and upon the grounds of the exhibition. This contrast which my friend from Ohio has not perceived is known in every cabin on the British Islands and every hamlet on the continent, and stimulates the immigration which is adding so vastly to our power and wealth.

But the gentleman may ask, "Does immigration add to our wealth?" I will not stop to reason the point with him, but will draw my reply from a recent number of the Pall Mall Gazette. In the course of an article under the title "Loss by Immigration," that journal says:

Immigration, no doubt, is a national safety-valve; but to insist that wholesale immigration of the population is the sole remedy for Ireland's ills is not statesmanship, but suicide. It is not empty sentimentalism, but rather the coarsest materialism, which justifies the protest against removing discontent by exiling the population. Every immigrant represents a money value, so many pounds sterling, which in New York is estimated at £200. Dr. Engel, head of the Prussian statistical bureau, calculated fifteen years ago that it cost Germany over £100 to bring up a member of the lower classes to the age of fifteen. Dr. Fabri, in his work on colonization, places the cost at £150, every penny of which is spent before the citizen becomes a producer instead of a consumer of wealth. He estimates the average net loss to Germany on every immigrant who leaves her shores at £100 sterling, and it is found that the average capital brought over by each German immigrant who lands at New York is over £20. It is, therefore, a low estimate to reckon the net loss to Ireland by every immigrant unnecessarily forced beyond the sea at £100. Why should it be "patriotic" to make the States a present of that sum, and "sentimentalism" to employ a smaller sum in converting the peasant into a contented landed proprietor at home?

WHAT SHIP-BUILDERS SAY.

Is the gentleman's sixth proposition more tenable than any of those that precede it? It is as follows:

The present protective tariff has driven the American carrying trade from the high seas by enhancing the price of materials which enter into the construction of vessels so that American ship-builders cannot compete with foreigners engaged in the same business.

Again, the gentleman is at fault in fact and inference. The appearance upon the ocean of the British privateers for whose destruction of our commerce the Geneva convention gave us a judgment, which the British Government accepted without demur and satisfied, antedated the protective duties to which the gentleman ascribes the driving of our carrying trade from the seas. Under the baneful influence of those privateers our carrying trade had disappeared long before the war closed, in June, 1865; while most of the duties now imposed by the several supplements to the Morrill bill of which the gentleman complains have been enacted since the date of that event. The duties which now foster sheep husbandry (so profitable to farmers) and the manufacture of woolen and worsted goods, Bessemer steel and rails, and other leading staples, were passed after the destruction of our carrying trade. I need not, however, elaborate this point. There is not a builder of iron vessels in the United States who does not stand ready to refute this proposition of the gentleman. The extensive yards of William Cramp's Sons are crowded with iron ships which the firm are building on contract for those who are to use several of them in foreign trade; and when, more than nine years ago, an attempt was made to reduce the duties which gave protection to the manufacturers of iron, that firm hastened to send a protest against such reduction, of which the following is a copy:

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, January 13, 1872.

DEAR SIR: Inasmuch as strenuous efforts are to be made during the present session of Congress to repeal the duties on ship-building materials, on the plea that it will aid American ship-builders and assist in building up our mercantile marine, and knowing that false impressions are prevalent in regard to this department of industry, we beg leave to call your attention to a few important facts, and to show that such action would not be beneficial but detrimental to our interests.

If any benefits could be derived from the repeal of duties on ship-building material, it would be chiefly in the construction of wooden ships. But steam is rapidly and permanently supplanting sails, and this in turn necessitates the change from wood to iron; for steamships, to be profitable and safe, must be constructed of iron.

Few persons are aware of the fact that it is absurd to talk of building iron ships in this country of imported iron, for this cannot be done. One reason is that nearly every piece of iron entering into their construction must be made to special order; and this fact, together with the necessity of rapid delivery, demands that the iron mills should be near the ship-yards. And it is plain to every practical ship-builder that if ships are to be constructed of foreign materials they will be constructed in foreign lands.

We now have in our own yards five first-class iron steamships in process of construction, with an aggregate tonnage of 13,000 tons, which will require for their construction 16,000,000 pounds of iron, and the ships, when completed, will cost $2,500,000; and yet the repeal of all the duties would not benefit us to the amount of $10,000.

While the repeal of the duties would scarcely afford even a temporary gain, it would, on the contrary, inflict upon us a permanent loss, by probably closing all the furnaces and mills to which we must look for our supplies.

The efforts of free-traders to secure free materials are evidently only preliminary to the more dangerous purpose of securing free foreign ships, of which England has a surplus of hundreds, of both wood and iron, which she would gladly sell at any price to get possession of our coasting trade.

The idle ship-yards in this country are those devoted to building wooden ships. There are six yards for building iron vessels in Philadelphia and vicinity, all of which are full of work. We think there are in process of construction sixteen iron steamers, seven of which range from 2,500 to 3,000 tons each.

Having been engaged thirty-five years in the construction of ships of every class, we feel competent to speak as to our own needs; and we are sure that we speak the sentiments of all engaged in ship-building when we ask that Congress shall not disturb the moderate protection afforded our iron manufacturers, but rather let well enough alone, and adhere to the policy which, by multiplying furnaces and rolling-mills, will furnish us a constant supply of materials, cheap and abundant.

W. CRAMP & SONS.
Wood and Iron Ship-builders.

Hon. WILLIAM D. KELLEY.

The then venerable head of the firm has meanwhile paid the debt of nature, but his united sons continue the business and adhere to the opinions expressed in this letter.

John Roach is the largest builder of ships in the United States, and when recently examined by a sub-committee of the Senate Committee on Finance, he stated that he carried more tonnage on the seas than was held by the entire membership of the Chamber of Commerce of New York. He therefore addressed the committee more as a ship-owner than as a ship-builder. In the course of his examination he invited the members of the sub-committee to consider a letter he had on the 1st of January last addressed to each member of the whole committee. I beg leave to invite the attention of the gentleman to the following extract from this letter, which, with that from the Messrs. Cramp, will, I think, convince him that the ship-builders of this country will regard his labors in their behalf as superserviceable and misdirected.

Mr. Roach had previously sent to the members of the committee a pamphlet and an address containing a thorough discussion of the whole subject, to which references are made in the course of the extract, and of which I have no doubt he would furnish copies to intelligent investigators of this subject:

I mail you herewith, at the request of your committee, a copy of my pamphlet on the American Carrying Trade, also a copy of an address delivered by me before the convention of ship-owning and other commercial bodies for the encouragement of the ocean commerce of the United States, held at Boston last October, and some other documents, which I hope you will find of interest.

The chief thing to be borne in mind in considering this question is, that it is a great national interest, both as a cheap means of defense and of carrying our products. It should be dealt with in the broadest and largest spirit. The policy that is adopted must not be narrow or sectional, but national, broad, and liberal enough to cover the whole country and conserve its best interests.

I desire here to call your attention to certain portions of the pamphlet and address which I think deserve to be emphasized as worthy your special consideration.

The advocates of free ships claim three things as necessary to revive our ocean carrying trade: 1. The repeal of the navigation laws. 2. Free material in everything that enters into the construction of a ship. 3. The right to buy ships in the cheapest market. The lack of this right is set down as one cause of our decline as carriers.

The first claim you will find treated on pages 9, 24, 25, 29, 31 to 35, inclusive, of the pamphlet, and on pages 15, 16, 23 of the address. The second claim is discussed on pages 30 and 31 of the pamphlet, beginning at III. The third claim is discussed on pages 21, 22, 26, 27, 28, and 63 of the pamphlet, and on pages 3, 4, 9 to 14, inclusive, and 20 of the address.

It is certainly a most significant fact that in the discussion of this question the free-ship advocates confine themselves so closely to the one point of original cost, persistently overlooking all the real obstacles in the way of our becoming again a ship-building and ship-owning country. These obstacles I have endeavored to make clear. I claim that we have certain great natural advantages for the construction of the ship at home. Our natural resources in coal and iron and timber, the materials of which the ship is built, are superior to those of any other country. As to the value and necessity of building our own ships if we hope to own them, I call your attention to the pamplet, pages 40, 41; address, page 13, (showing the result upon France of buying free ships, though she had every advantage of cheap capital and cheap labor to run them.) As to the national and economic reasons why we should have a powerful merchant marine, see pamphlet, pages 45 to 53, inclusive; address, 22, 23, and 32.

But perhaps the most important point of all, and one that enters as a vital factor into this question, is that of protecting American labor and furnishing it employment by the fostering and encouragement of American industries. The elevation of labor is the policy on which our Government was founded. The issues of the future will be on the labor question. The interests of labor cannot safely be overlooked or trifled with, and our policy with reference to all great national questions must be shaped in accordance with the fundamental idea of our Government. The workmen of this country will demand by their votes the development of our resources by the competition of our own labor and capital. And that brings us to the original cost of the ship, which the free-ship advocates say is the vital point. Why can we not build ships as cheap as England can? Because 90 per cent. of the ship is labor, and American labor costs more than English labor. Because our workingmen cannot be ground down as European workingmen are. Two things confront us: to reduce the wages of labor to what they are in Europe, (see comparison on page 67 of the pamphlet,) or to leave our forests and mines with their wealth undeveloped and thousands of workmen without employment. Have we not in our own country most convincing evidences of the effect of such a policy? Look at the South, with her forests, her coal and iron beds, and every advantage; yet she refused to adopt a policy of home development such as other sections pursued, and is only now awakening to the consequences of such a course.

On page 73 and following, you will find some facts on another pressing subject—the opening of new markets for our rapidly increasing surplus products; also the instructive history of some efforts made in that direction. See also pages 24 and following of the address.

In regard to the facts as to oppressive taxation (pages 26, 27, pamphlet, and pages 11 and 12 of the address,) it may be claimed that this is a local tax of New York. So it is, but it is a tax that affects something like three-fourths of our entire shipping in the foreign trade; and I believe there are local taxes also at the other principal ports. This whole matter should be regulated and protected by a national law, placing our foreign shipping on equal terms in all ports and giving it all the advantages possessed by foreign ships entering our harbors.

When it is said that we cannot build the ship as cheap as other nations, I ask your attention to what we have done with the locomotive, (as shown on pages 18 and 19 of the address.) This proves what we can do with a fair chance and wise encouragement. And the same thing can be done in the case of the ship as has been done in the case of the locomotive. For what we have done in iron ship-building, indeed, against every kind of obstacle, see pages 54 and 55 of the pamphlet. We need more ships than any other nation, since we have more surplus products to carry than any other. We have superior resources, the most skilled and energetic workmen, the best seamen in the world. Can there be any good reason why we should not build and own the ships in which our products are carried?

In view of the vast freighting business whose profits we may and should secure to our own people, in view of the great national advantages accruing from both the building and owning of ships and the extension of our commerce by means of them, can we afford to be and remain dependent for our ships or carrying upon a foreign nation? On this point see pages 6 and 7 of the pamphlet.

As you are doubtless well aware, for fifteen years this subject has been pressed upon Congress by the free-ship advocates, yet they have never brought forward any argument but that of first cost, never anything that would not make us dependent upon a foreign country—that country always being England, the only one that can build iron ships or supply us with the raw material. Why was this? It could not be that they were ignorant of the many obstacles which I have pointed out. Was it because they did not want to make them known, as that would not serve their interest? If buying cheap ships is all we want, why are not France and Germany great carrying and ship-owning nations? They have the right to buy ships where they can buy them the cheapest. On this point, see pamphlet, pages 40, 41; address, page 13.

England has always recognized that only a ship-building nation can be a ship-owning nation to any extent. In 1840, when she was losing her carrying trade because we could build the cheapest, fastest clipper-ships, she began to develop the iron ship that she might supply her own wants. And to develop the iron ship, which cost her double what she paid us for a wooden ship, she has paid since 1840, call it subsidy or what you will, over two hundred million dollars. With one hand, by her wise and generous policy, she paid out this vast sum to her own merchants and people, while with the other she gathered a thousandfold from our Treasury. So when the civil war came upon us and gave her an advantage, with her large capital invested, she was able to drive us from the sea. There is a lesson for us in this policy which she has pursued with such results. The free-ship advocate will say that part of that policy was in buying where she could buy ships cheapest; but she never bought any iron ships; her policy was to encourage the building of them at home, until like ourselves with the locomotive, she could build them cheaper than any other nation. What was the meaning of the outcry that has been of late months, and joined in equally by both parties, about the Chinese? What is the objection to cheap labor? Simply that it is cheap, and that its employment must result either in lowering the wages of American workingmen or taking their work from them. And no party would be likely to advocate such a course as that. Yet I sincerely believe that even Chinese labor, bad as it would be for American workmen, would not be so bad for them and the country as free trade. Since it would at least be better to have the labor done in our own country and the money kept at home, and our own resources developed than to buy the products of cheap labor abroad, draining our Treasury of its gold and sending it to circulate among foreign workingmen and pay taxes for the support of a foreign government each year $10,000,000.

We do not want either alternative, and we need not accept it. While it would undoubtedly be better for us to build ships in our own yards even by Chinese cheap labor than to buy them in China or England, or any other foreign market, we do not want to do either. If there is any principle at all in this labor problem, if there be any justice in this outcry against the Chinese, there certainly is as much justice in claiming protection for that labor which makes up 90 per cent. of the ship's cost.

While free trade would introduce a ruinous competition with American labor, yet when the European workingman comes to make his home here his labor produces no such result, and he is welcome to all our advantages. That proves the value and difference of having the work done in our own country in order that its advantages may be secured by ourselves. Create a demand for the ship by removing the obstacles and placing us on equal terms with the shipping of other nations engaged in the foreign trade by pursuing a wise policy such as England has pursued, and there will be no trouble about the original cost. It is now only 15 per cent., though we have but begun the development of our iron ship-building interest. In a short time we should be able to compete with foreign builders on equal terms.

The point of economic national defense is also an important one. The policy of our Government has been opposed to a large standing army. Importance has attached, therefore, to the maintenance of an efficient citizen soldiery.

The statesmen who passed the navigation laws recognized the great extent of our coasts, and framed those laws so that by holding American-built ships in allegiance to our flag we might have a militia on the sea, ready and equipped at all times to be called into Government service, yet costing the nation nothing in time of peace. And I may say that the one hundred iron steamships built in this country since 1870, manned as they are by as able officers, engineers, and sailors as any in the world, would be worth more to the Government in the event of a war than our Navy. Should we destroy the power that creates all this? Repeal our navigation laws, if you will, but mark the consequence. In case you get into a foreign war, this fleet can hoist a foreign flag, leave you, go where it can earn the most money, free itself from American taxation, and then return when the war is over.

What a merchant marine this would be in such an exigency. The whole question resolves itself into this, whether this country, with more goods to carry, with more need of ships, with more raw material to use, with better natural advantages, with more skilled labor and better energy, and with more coast to defend than any other, shall be independent and build its own ships, thus encouraging all its industries and protecting its own labor on which the foundations of this Government were laid, or shall it become dependent entirely upon a foreign nation for ships, and let its own workingmen shift for themselves when the bread has been taken from their mouths? To do the latter would be to refuse the advantages God has given us.

Make this issue, and when the people come to understand it there will be no question as to how they will decide. Remember, too, in dealing with this subject, that all the nations of the world, except England, are interested in having more than one country that can build ships.

LOW DUTIES DO NOT PREVENT SMUGGLING.

While the gentleman is ruminating upon the ingratitude of American ship-builders generally, and of the Messrs. Cramp and John Roach specially, let me proceed to consider his seventh proposition, which is:

A protective tariff increases the possibility of the crime of smuggling.

The intent of the gentleman is not very clearly expressed. If he means the possibility of increased profits to the successful smuggler, I admit the proposition. The larger the duty the greater must be the gain by its evasion. If, on the other hand, he intended to assert that a high tariff increases the tendency to smuggle, I deny the assertion, and refer, in support of my position, to the fact that the necessity of repealing the duty on diamonds, the lowest duty known to our tariff, is often urged because, low as it is, it invites smuggling to such an extent as to damage honest importers.

As the gentleman seems to have confined his study of economic questions to theoretic writers, he is probably not aware that more than thirty years ago a committee appointed by this House to consider and report on the commercial relations of the United States with all foreign nations embodied in its report part of a memorial presented by the class of commerce of the Society for the Promotion of Commerce and Industry in Geneva, in which those manufacturers of watches upon which when imported into this country there was a duty of but 10 per cent. prayed that it should be reduced to 5 per cent., in order to induce Swiss manufacturers less conscientious than themselves to abandon the practice of accompanying their exports with false and fraudulent invoices. From this appeal, as I find it in the report of the committee of the House, I submit the following extract:

If, in casting the eye over Western Switzerland, we should inquire what articles form the basis of our exchange with the United States, we would find that the variety is exceedingly limited, though in value they are quite important. First, watches, which pay an import duty of 10 per cent. in the ports of the United States. The opinion is general among the watch manufacturers of Geneva that this duty is moderate, and they would not think of asking a reduction unless, indeed, they should be actuated in doing so by considerations of morality and justice, resulting from a belief that if the duty were reduced by 5 per cent. it would remove every inducement on the part of the manufacturers to make false declarations, and would thus protect the honest and conscientious dealer from the disadvantages under which he is placed by declarations of value below the real cost of the merchandise; hence a reduction of this duty by one-half would seem to be demanded by expediency, as it would unquestionably regulate and extend the trade.

When the gentleman remembers that the object of trade is profit, he will see that any rate of duty holds out inducements not only to the smuggler to ply his trade, but also to the consignor, who may invoice his goods at lower prices than those at which he sells, and thereby defraud the government to whose country he exports of the duties to which it is entitled.

While the human heart remains as desperately wicked as it is, and while ambition and avarice prompt men to lawless deeds, any rate of duty will offer possibilities for the crime of smuggling. If the gentleman would put an end to that criminal practice, he must accept the dogma propounded to the American people by the Cobden Club, that free trade requires the abolition of all American custom-houses and the maintenance of our Government by internal taxation alone.

THE PROTECTIVE POLICY IS A PREREQUISITE TO THE DEVELOPMENT OF AN EXPORT TRADE.

The eighth proposition of the gentleman is:

A protective tariff shuts out the American manufacturer from the markets of the world.

To this proposition he appends the following argument:

Mexico and South America are supplied with their manufactured goods by England. Our best interests demand that the protective barrier our legislation has erected shall be broken down, that American skill and enterprise may have an opportunity to compete with foreign manufactures everywhere. Our manufactures need more an increase of market, by which foreign capital can be brought into this country, than protective legislation, which takes money from one American pocket to put it into another.

To answer all this I refer the gentleman to my rejoinder to his first proposition, and say to him that whatever article we produce in excess of the demands of the home market is exported and finds ready sale in foreign countries. They are comparatively few, and are commended to foreign consumers by the excellence of their quality. They embrace among other things every variety of saws, sewing-machines, the better class of watches, surgical instruments, locomotives, passenger cars, especially street cars, butter, cheese, and lard. Our protective legislation has erected no barrier against the export of the productions of American skill and enterprise. On the contrary, by increasing our production it constantly adds to our power to export. The protective system by building up centers of industry in every part of the country has created a home demand for 90 per cent. of our cereals, provisions, and other farm products. The surplus we export. We also export petroleum, cotton, and tobacco, because we produce each year more than the home market can consume. For the same reason China and Japan export raw silk and tea; India, raw jute, dye stuffs, and crude drugs; Brazil, coffee; France, wines and manufactured silks; and England, manufactures in general. When by the persistent maintenance of an adequately protective system the capacity of our factories shall exceed the home demand, our export of manufactured goods will make itself felt in the markets of the world.

If, as the gentleman asserts, it be true that our protective tariff is a barrier to exports or a restriction upon international trade, how will he explain the immense progress which characterizes our foreign trade, both in the matter of exports and imports. The year 1879 showed an excess of both over that of any preceding year, and the following paragraph, taken from a leading mercantile journal of free-trade proclivities, will show how much those of 1880 exceeded those of 1879:

The value of the imports of merchandise into the United States during the calendar year of 1880 was $696,803,433, an increase of $183,200,637 over the imports of 1879. The specie value of exports during the same period was $889,649,840, an increase of $124,490,015 over 1879. Excess of exports over imports in 1880, $192,846,407. The value of exports of merchandise during the month of December last was $98,856,632, being larger than during any previous month in the history of the country. The excess of imports of gold and silver coin and bullion during the year 1880 was $69,229,822, against $67,375,960 in 1879.

Damaging to the gentleman's theories as are the facts presented by this paragraph, he may take refuge in the suggestion that I have chosen an exceptional period and drawn a general conclusion from an individual instance. In this he would however be mistaken. I am happily able to present a table of our annual exports and imports for a period of twenty years, which shows that our foreign trade during nineteen years of protection expanded from a total of $479,555,941 to a total of $1,480,305,239. Appended to the admirable reply of Dr. John L. Hayes, of Boston, to the impudent letter of Augustus Mongredien, to which I have referred, I find the following note, which shows how gradual yet how rapid has been the growth of our foreign trade under a protective tariff:

That protection increases foreign commerce, both imports and exports, is most remarkably shown by twenty years' experience under the Morrill tariff, with its complements and improvements, as shown in the following table, compiled from the reports of the Bureau of Statistics, giving the total of all the imports and exports of merchandise by the United States in each fiscal year, from 1861 to 1880:

The gentleman, when speaking in support of his resolution, referred to the state of our trade in 1860, when the rate of duty was, he said, but about 18 per cent. This was an unfortunate reference. We were then under the lowest tariff, that of 1857, which has prevailed since the peace of 1815. What was the condition of the people and the Government in 1860? The people were without employment and want pervaded every section of the country. So utterly had the credit of the Government disappeared that when it invited all the world to bid for a loan of $5,000,000 which Congress had authorized, it received bids for but $2,500,000 at annual rates of interest ranging from 8 to 32 per cent. What our exports and imports were for that year I cannot at this moment say, but the foregoing table enables me to speak of 1861, the trade of which year was conducted under the same law. In that year we imported $274,656,325, and our total trade, exports and imports, amounted to $479,555,941. Since then we have had nineteen consecutive years of the highest ranges of duties ever known to the American people. The trade of 1880 having been under the rate of 46¾ per cent., if the gentleman's theory were correct we should have imported less than in 1860, and exported less, because, he tells us, that if we do not take commodities from foreign nations they cannot take our goods—that trade is mere exchange of commodities. Now, it happens that in 1880 we imported $656,198,440 and exported $824,106,799. In what did we receive the larger part of the difference between our imports of merchandise and our exports? Gold, sir; gold. Nations take from us, whether we buy from them or not, those things which they must have and of which we produce a surplus, and pay for them if need be with gold. Thus we who, but a short time since, could not maintain specie payments, are now said to have the largest and most rapidly increasing stock of gold of any of the commercial nations of the world.

Let us look at this thing from another point of view. Our total commerce, including imports and exports, in 1861, under a purely revenue tariff, was $479,000,000, while in 1880, under our highly protective duties, more than $1,000,000,000 had been added to this amount, for our foreign trade last year amounted to more than $1,480,000,000. The gentleman should have given some consideration to the actual condition of the industries and trade of his country before committing himself anew to propositions which were impressed upon his youthful mind by indolent professors who found it easier to accept sophisms, which they found ready collated and illustrated in British text-books, than to give practical study to the questions involved in a true social science.

The suggestion that a protective tariff restricts external trade is not original with the gentleman. Sir John Byles discussed it with the free-traders of England in the first edition of his Sophisms. In chapter 10, under the caption, Protection would destroy External Trade, he says:

One answer to this assertion is an appeal to facts. No nation has adopted the theory and practice of protection to the same extent as England; no nation has at the same time enjoyed so extensive and lucrative a foreign trade. For centuries the protective policy has been unquestioned and triumphant; for centuries our foreign trade has been steadily augmenting. The strictest protection in the world has coincided with the greatest foreign trade in the world.

In truth, the domestic activity, industry, and prosperity, fostered by the protective system, is the surest basis of a permanent and extensive and mutual foreign trade.

In the first place, with protection and a certain home market have arisen the means of purchase. Under a strict and jealous system of protection we have seen the rise of Manchester, Birmingham, Sheffield, Merthyr, Leeds, Glasgow, Huddersfield, Bradford, Nottingham, Coventry, Leicester. We have seen skill and machinery brought to perfection. Protection has not blunted the invention or superseded the ingenuity of our countrymen. On the contrary, our cottons, and woolens, and hardware were the best in the world. What England would have been without protection from foreign manufactures, we know not. She might have been what Ireland now is without protection from British manufactures. But it is certain that with protection the means of purchase have been created and multiplied in a degree marvelous, and transcending all anticipation. Had the manufacturing prosperity of England been matter of ancient history, looking at its diminutive size on the map of the world, it would have been deemed incredible and fabulous. Our means of purchase are immense and inexhaustible. All we now want is markets—but markets for the support and existence of these means of purchase, as well as for their increase. A sure market created them; insecure and precarious markets will destroy them, and leave in their place a wretched and discontented population. Thus with protection has arisen the first indispensable prerequisite for foreign trade—things to give in exchange for foreign commodities; in other words, the means of purchase—exports.

The weight of authority against the gentleman's proposition is overwhelming. The Cobden Club recently invited one of its most distinguished members, Sir Louis Mallett, C. B., to dispose of the alleged heresy of reciprocity in trade, which is growing rapidly among the English people; and in the course of the letter addressed to Mr. Thomas Bayley Potter, secretary of the Cobden Club, on that question, Sir Louis illustrated not only the extent of our exports to the British Islands, but did it by showing what the gentleman will be surprised to learn, that free-trade England collects annually about five million dollars more in duties upon the goods she imports from protective America than protective America does on the goods she imports from free-trade England. On this subject he says:

The £20,000,000 which we annually raise in duties on foreign goods may be roughly divided among our different neighbors in the following proportions:

The United States of America	£6,000,000
India and China	3,500,000
France	1,500,000
Spain	1,000,000
Germany	880,000
Portugal	450,000
Greece	320,000
Holland	150,000
Italy	80,000
British possessions	400,000
Other foreign countries	200,000

And of all these countries there is hardly one which draws as large a revenue from the taxation of British produce. To take only two examples, the United States and France. The total value of British produce exported to the former country in 1877 was £16,300,000; making allowance for the entry of a certain amount of goods duty free, the average rate levied can hardly be put higher than 30 per cent., which would give a total revenue of about five million pounds, while in the case of France the duties actually levied on British goods in the same year amounted to a little over eight hundred thousand pounds.

THE REMEDY PROPOSED—REDUCED WAGES AND INCREASED TAXES FOR WORKINGMEN.

The ninth proposition of the gentleman is as follows:

Ninth. To the end that the present tariff shall become one for revenue only, the following changes should be made: First, on all dutiable articles producing little or no revenue to the Government, the duty should be returned to a revenue basis, or they should be placed upon the free list; second, the duty upon tea and coffee should be restored, and to the extent that this duty produces revenue to the Government the duty should be removed from salt and clothing, and other articles indispensably necessary in domestic life.

The gentleman is evidently not aware that it is in times of commercial and industrial depression that the protecting influence of a tariff is needed and felt. If he will examine the range of prices through which Bessemer rails have fluctuated as exhibited in the preceding table, and compare them with the seasons in which that article has yielded little or no revenue and those in which it has yielded the highest annual amount, he will find that though the duty was specific, so much per ton, not an ad valorem diminishing as prices fell, we received least duty when we could have imported rails at the lowest prices, and most when we had to pay the highest prices for them. Thus during the prevalence of the commercial depression of 1873 and following years there was no demand for rails. Our own works were but feebly employed. Under these circumstances we imported few if any rails, and of course received little or no revenue. Would it have been wise, therefore, to have acted on the gentleman's suggestion and repealed the duty on rails because it "produced little or no revenue to the Government?" With the restoration of confidence came a demand for rails; prices rose; our mills could not supply the demand, and enormous importations were made, with consequent increase of revenue to the Government. Meanwhile competition between home and foreign producers regulated prices and kept them below what England demanded when she had a monopoly of our market. The primary office of a protective tariff is to secure the home market to its producers in seasons of depression and to enable the Government to collect from foreigners a consideration for the privilege of entering our markets in seasons of prosperity, during which their commodities command high prices. The gentleman's rule will not work. It would deprive American capital and labor of its defense in the seasons when they most needed it.

But no reduction of duty on rails, and I take them as an illustration of the law that prevails with reference to all commodities, would have brought revenue during that season of terrible depression. The nation's revenues fell off because the consumptive power of the people was suspended; and had we acted on the gentleman's proposition, we might, in the hope of inviting an importation of rails, have placed them on the free list, and yet failed to induce those who did not need any to import them.

Nor are his other suggestions more judicious than this one. He would restore the duties on tea and coffee. In this he dissents from the historic policy of his party. Free-trader and protectionist have agreed that the duties on tea and coffee protected no American industry, as we produce neither article, and were, therefore, a pure tax upon the consumer. As the farmers and laborers of the country are the great consumers of tea and coffee, the democratic party, made up as it has been so largely of representatives of the South and West, favored the abolition of these duties. They were imposed during the war with general regret, and it was upon the motion of the present democratic Speaker of the House that they were repealed. To restore them now would be simply to increase the price of tea and coffee, and abstract from the farmers and laborers of the country the amount of duty they would yield. While thus increasing the cost of these essentials of American life, the gentleman would, to the extent that these duties should produce revenue, remove the protective duties "from salt, clothing, and other articles indispensably necessary in domestic life." These our laborers do produce. The duties upon them protect their wages. Thus, while making an assault on the wages of those engaged in producing the necessaries of life, the gentleman would enhance the cost of imported food. The proposition is not a patriotic one or one that will find favor among farmers and workingmen.

LET THE LONDON TIMES PRONOUNCE JUDGMENT.

Mr. Chairman, thus have I attempted to refute the sophisms which the gentleman proclaims as principles, and to disprove the assumed facts upon which they are based. Let the argument go to the country. Nay, more; having portrayed the results of ten years of the revenue tariff of 1846, which brought us from prosperity to bankruptcy, notwithstanding our production of more than a thousand millions of gold during a decade, I now in conclusion point to the results of nineteen consecutive years of high protection. I will not attempt to portray them. It has been admirably done by another; and I submit to my friend, the gentleman from Ohio, the summary of a stranger, of one whose fidelity to the principles of free trade he will not doubt, who has never a kind word to say for the protective system, as he is a profound believer in free trade—the editor of the London Times. Between the gentleman and me this free-trader shall decide by presenting the results of the last ten years of protection. If he finds the growth of our country to be sluggish, and our people to be wanting in enterprise or needing the comforts of life, his judgment will sustain the argument of the gentleman. If, on the other hand, he shows a measure of material development and social progress hitherto unknown to history, and that it has been marked by the development, side by side over the vast expanse of our country, of new agricultural regions, and of centers of industry in their midst, that town and country goes together, I shall claim that his judgment vindicates the protective policy under which these grand results have been attained. Here is what the London Times says of our progress during the last decade:

AMERICA'S MAGNIFICENT PROGRESS.

The details we publish this morning of the principal facts elicited by last year's census of the United States confirm the impression the original summary of results produced. A nation has never exhibited a more magnificent picture of material progress for ten years. Since 1870 more than eleven and a half millions have been added to the population, at a rate of 30 per cent. increase. Except China and Great Britain and Russia, no Government can count more subjects. In the number of citizens moved by similar impulses, and recognizing common ends, the British Empire itself yields to the great Republic. Fifty millions of human beings in a land like America more than match the 86,000,000 of European and Asiatic Russia. The 425,000,000 of China are not to be compared with them as a force among mankind. The growth of a population may generally be understood to imply the growth of wealth and resources. As each census in a European state indicates a numerical advance, it may for the most part be inferred that fresh means of support have been made available. When, however, every successive census in the United States reveals an expansion by bounds and leaps, faith in the instinct of human nature not to multiply beyond the power of existence is scarcely needed to reassure anxiety. The granary which is to feed the new millions which have come, the millions which are to follow, piles its stores for the whole world to certify them. Each added American citizen has not to search for the livelihood nature hides somewhere or other for all its children. He is born or imported with his inheritance labeled and allotted. He has but to go west, or north, or south; there it is awaiting his advent.

European populations, even the home population of Great Britain, it must be acknowledged, have rather in their decennial polls a look of boys growing out of their clothes. An elbow or an ankle is sure to be seen betraying a want of proportion between past resources and present demands. On the other side of the Atlantic there is a magazine of clothes warranted to fit all ages and sizes. Good soil is crying out everywhere for its owners to come and possess it. They have not to conquer and annex. Though the domain be lying desolate, or be a hunting-ground for Indians, it confesses itself their own, for them to enter it and enjoy it as soon as they please, the sooner the better. How fresh thousands and hundreds of thousands of acres are continually being brought under tillage, Europe requires no census ordered from Washington to tell. The West and the Northwest are a home farm for the older hemisphere; the laborers on this side of the Atlantic hear the echo of each mile of territory broken up by the plow on that. The census shows that the growth is universal and not partial. The census itself hardly does justice to the energy with which the South is keeping pace with the rest. The rate in one class of industry approximates to that in another. As the farmers of Minnesota have multiplied from 439,706 in 1870 to 780,707 in 1880, the commercial and mining population of Pennsylvania has risen from 3,521,951 to 4,282,738.

While the vegetable and mineral riches of the West are being reduced into possession for the benefit of the universe at large, American cities assert their right to take toll of the fruits before they are distributed over the earth. If the State of Colorado can boast 174,649 inhabitants as against 39,864 ten years ago, Chicago points, after a proportion hardly unequal, to 503,304 citizens against 298,977 in 1870, and San Francisco to 233,956 as against 149,473. When cities have enlarged to the dimensions of New York and Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore, they extend more slowly, yet they too may discover ample foundation in the census of last June for their own belief that they are taking higher rank among the commercial cities of the world. What is more remarkable still is the equivalent expansion of smaller local centers. That Saint Louis and Cincinnati and New York and Baltimore and the like should fringe the vast grain and cotton and beef bearing regions of the Union with populous and luxurious towns is only what might have been anticipated. It was certain that they would grow with the growth of agricultural industry. To the late Mr. Cobbett they would have seemed as much of idle wasting wens as London itself with his Mayfair, its exchange, its parliament, and its law courts. They are, in truth, as necessary to American prosperity as the minerals of Nevada and California and the corn-fields of Illinois and Iowa. But the Union might have had its splendid towns and its breadths of fertile plains and valleys without any very intimate connection between the two.

It is a peculiarity of North American development, and evidence of its solidity, that town and country grow together. As the branches and roots of a healthy tree should stretch forth in unison, prosperous country life in a newly-planted American territory is certain to have its reflex in a thriving neighboring market town. Not many Englishmen are familiar with the name of Minneapolis. Yet Minneapolis, in Minnesota, which in 1870 had 13,066 citizens, and now has 46,887, is as much a center of corporate vitality as York, and a great deal more than Marylebone or Paddington. The Hobokens, the Omahas, the Toledos, the Wheelings, the Grand Rapids are more real wonders of United States progress than the magnificent emporiums of trade, like New York and Saint Louis and Chicago and Pittsburgh. Europe can do more than equal the one class in the apparatus of civilization, if not in rapidity of growth; for the other it has no parallel. As soon as the pioneers go forth into the woods and prairies to reclaim their latent treasures, most of the luxuries and many of the comforts of civilization attend their steps. Within no more time than it takes to open the mine or the forest, a town rises contiguous to their homesteads. The figures our Philadelphia correspondent appends to his condensation of the last census bring into relief this most striking of all the features of American vigor. Americans differ extraordinarily among themselves in the vocations they pursue. North and South differ in moral and mental organization; East and West differ hardly less. Every State has its idiosyncrasies by which its population may be distinguished. Yet all Americans agree in a common determination nowhere to sever themselves from the incidents of nineteenth century existence. They are ready to bury themselves in mines and to plunge into the untrodden wilderness. They insist, however, that a camp shall track their footsteps equipped with the ordinary accompaniments of municipal life. They must have within not impracticable distance the lecture hall, the church, the newspaper office. They will not, at whatever cost, cease to feel themselves not merely Americans but American citizens.

The result does not conduce to the picturesqueness of American nationality. As the European tourist traverses the Union he is amazed at the high standard of social convenience throughout the enormous dominion. All that can be accomplished by human co-operation he perceives has been accomplished in a greater or less degree for the benefit of the American farmer. England and France and Germany could not conceive a form of material or intellectual enjoyment of which the universal American population would not demand a share or a duplicate. On the other hand, the effect is occasionally like that of a dinner at a cheap Paris restaurant. The order and the number and the titles of the banquets of the extravagant vicinity are faithfully reproduced, with alien substances and a counterfeit flavor. A foreign observer of American institutions in the newer States and Territories regrets the local and racy charm disguised to him by what he may think a false mimicry of a more advanced cultivation. In truth, there is no conscious mimicry, and no absence of reality in intention or enjoyment. The farmer of the West and the tradesman of the ten or twenty year old town of his district are natural enough in the resemblance they maintain to the habits and tastes of Boston and New York. Wherever the American goes he carries himself with him unchanged, however changed may be his calling and his circumstances. To lament the dead if high level, and the loss of the charm of variety, is to lament that in which the essence of American national progress consists. If there is little fear for the integrity of American nationality, vast as the area over which it extends, and impossible as may seem its future bulk, the reason is to be sought in the unity of the mold in which each new development is cast. At every step the Union takes toward appropriating its estate, the last annexed township assumes a social as well as a political aspect indistinguishable from all the rest. The model is not in New York, or Boston, or Washington. Were there a dominant center or centers, jealousy or a suspicion of oppression might alienate distant territories. Every American conveys his ideal with him to the extremities of his land. When he plants a new settlement it and its members spontaneously assume the same guise which prevails elsewhere. Instead of any diminution in the tendency to uniformity, it increases. The South itself cannot resist the impulse. It is certainly not to be desired that it should. An immense wave of uniform civilization spreading over the huge domain which the Congress of the United States sways is a strange and, on the whole, an admirable phenomenon.

Sir, in conclusion let me say, that if systems may be judged by their results, this presentation by the London Times of those of the last of two consecutive decades of high protection furnishes to the world abundant evidence that our tariff legislation has not, as the gentleman asserts, been mistaken or obstructive.

Mr. FELTON addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. COVERT. I move the committee rise for the purpose of closing general debate on the pending bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly rose; and Mr. DAVIS, of California, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. COVERT. I now move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all general debate be limited to one minute.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COVERT. I now insist on my motion that the House resolve itself into committee.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, and general debate has been limited to one minute.

Mr. COVERT. I now move the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEED DIVISION.

For compensation of superintendent of seed division, $1,800; one superintendent of flower-seed room, $900.

And it is hereby enacted that, in addition to the proper vouchers and accounts for the sums herein appropriated to the accounting officers of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Agriculture shall present a detailed statement of the manner of the expenditure of the amounts hereby appropriated, to accompany his estimates to be presented at the next regular session of Congress: Provided, That no part of these sums shall be paid to any person receiving at the same time other compensation as an officer or employé of the Government.

Mr. KING. I move to amend by adding the following:

That the sum of $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the purchase and distribution of seed-cane.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because I am informed the Commissioner of Agriculture under the law has no authority to purchase for distribution seed-cane. Now, there are varieties of that growth, especially in some of the high latitudes of Mexico, which are most desirable. But it is said he has not the means of procuring them for distribution. I believe my amendment is not objectionable to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, and I trust it will be adopted.

Mr. COVERT. Just one word in reply. So far as I am personally concerned I can have no objection whatever to the distribution of seeds of such kinds and in such proportion as the Commissioner of Agriculture may deem proper; but I have to say in this connection that the committee in formulating this bill have made ample provision for the distribution of all necessary and proper seeds, and a large sum is appropriated—some $80,000—for that purpose. This $80,000 is to be expended by the Commissioner of Agriculture for the propagation and distribution of seed. Under the provision of the bill, if he sees the necessity and recognizes the moving force of the suggestion of the gentleman from Louisiana, he has ample scope and power under the phraseology of the bill to do what the gentleman asks. I am constrained to oppose the amendment, and trust it will not be adopted.

Mr. KING. I understand the chairman of the committee to state there is authority under the law for the Commissioner of Agriculture to purchase seed-cane from abroad.

Mr. COVERT. There is general authority, I desire to say to the gentleman from Louisiana, given in this particular section of the bill. It authorizes the Commissioner to purchase such seeds that are new and valuable for introduction into this country as in his judgment he may deem best.

Mr. KING. Upon that statement I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS, ETC.

For the purchase and distribution according to law, as provided in sections 526 and 527 of the Revised Statutes, of new and valuable seeds, plants, trees, shrubs, vines, and cuttings, and for testing by cultivation the value of such of them as may require such tests, and for the propagating of such as may be worthy of propagation, and for the distribution of the same among agriculturists in different sections of the country, according to the demands of climate and soil, $80,000.

Mr. ANDERSON. As I understand my esteemed friend, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, this paragraph changes existing law. I send to the Clerk's desk to have read sections 526 and 527 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 526. The Commissioner of Agriculture shall procure and preserve all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by means of books and correspondence, and by practical and scientific experiments, accurate records of which experiments shall be kept in his office, by the collection of statistics, and by any other appropriate means within his power; he shall collect new and valuable seeds and plants; shall test, by cultivation, the value of such of them as may require such tests; shall propagate such as may be worthy of propagation; and shall distribute them among agriculturists.

SEC. 527. The purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another; and the purchase or propagation and distribution of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

Mr. ANDERSON. That was the law under which the Department of Agriculture was established. In the appropriation bill passed at the last session of Congress there was a change made in the law to this extent. The Commissioner of Agriculture held, and properly enough, perhaps, that under the organic law the seeds were to be distributed by him—"that he shall distribute them"—therefore, that they could not be distributed through members upon their request unless he saw fit to have it so done. Accordingly you will remember, perhaps, that when the last appropriation bill was introduced there was also introduced a proviso, which was adopted by the House, and I now ask the Clerk to read so much of that act as is marked and also the last clause of the act, which provides that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are repealed; and the point which I make is this, that the appropriation act of last year to a certain extent repealed the original act in the Revised Statutes, and is now the law.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase and propagation and distribution, as required by law, of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expenses of putting up the same, $80,000; an equal proportion of three-fourths of all seeds, plants, and cuttings shall, upon their request, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their agricultural constituents; and the persons receiving such seeds shall inform the Department of the results of the experiments therewith.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 3. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. ANDERSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the bill which is before the House, as I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, is designed to repeal the act or the proviso in this appropriation bill of last year. I hold, therefore, that this becomes subject to a clause in section 3 of Rule XXI, which provides:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

If the Chair will remember, the amount appropriated last year was $80,000 for this purpose. The amount appropriated in this act is also $80,000. There is consequently no reduction of expenditures and I submit to the Chair that the point of order lies as against so much of this proposition as relates to section 526 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Kansas has discussed not only the question raised by his point of order but in addition to that has addressed himself to the merits of his proposed amendment. I desire to call particularly the attention of the chairman of the committee to the second branch of this proposition, and to the express wording of the statute itself covering this matter of seed distribution. That expressly declares that new and valuable seeds—seeds of economic value—shall be purchased, in the manner proposed, by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and shall be distributed by him—how? The statute says among agriculturists. It does not say among members of Congress. It does not provide that they shall be distributed among the people of the country, to the people at large and indefinitely, but to those engaged in agriculture; to agriculturists; and the committee attempted last year when it reported this provision in the appropriation bill to this House to conform itself strictly and entirely to the phraseology of the statute concerning this distribution. They have made the attempt at this time to conform to the express wording of the statute. Now, as to the proposition of my friend from Kansas as to the repealing clause contained in the act of last year. It is true that repealing clause found place at the end of that appropriation bill; but if the theory of my friend shall be followed out and adopted as controlling in this matter the Federal Congress would find itself absolutely powerless to repeal nine-tenths of the laws which have found their places upon our statute-books. It is only the customary and formal ending of all general bills, appropriation bills and others, that all acts and parts of acts in conflict with them shall be repealed; and if his theory should prevail it would be absolutely impossible to change or repeal any law in conflict therewith without a special and independent act. I cannot, therefore, see anything in the point of order raised by my friend that challenges a serious consideration.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that my point in reference to the repealing clause of the last act was simply to show that, in so far as the proviso in the appropriation act of last year affected the original law as read from the Revised Statutes, that original law was now repealed to that extent, and therefore was not the existing law. I wish to lay that point before the Chair, that through that repealing clause of the act the present law is precisely as provided in the appropriation bill of last year.

Upon another point I wish to say I agree with the chairman of the committee and with the committee as to the objects for which these seeds should be used. There is no point of difference as to that, and it is not my object to antagonize that idea. The whole question in a nutshell is just this: the Commissioner of Agriculture cannot personally distribute these seeds, but has it done through his clerks; he can just as well have it done by the direction of a member of Congress. That is the whole of it. But that is upon the merits of the question, which I have no desire to discuss at present. I submit the point to the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say a word on the point of order. If we look to the statutes it will be seen that the appropriation act of last year did not repeal the whole of these statutes. It only changed in part the mode of distributing the seeds. It left to the Commissioner still the distribution of one-fourth of those seeds. It left all the other parts of those statutes in force. So that those sections are not repealed by that clause, but only modified in one particular as to the distribution of the seeds.

As to the main point, the distribution of the seeds, it seems to me there is no call for sustaining the point of order. And I want to say besides while I am on the floor, on the question of distribution of seeds, I regretted very much last year that the bill changed the plan previously in existence and charged members, instead of attending to their legitimate duties, with sending out garden seeds through the country, when any citizen can buy for a dime as many seeds at a seed store as we take the time away from our duties to send to him. I hope the recommendation of the Committee on Agriculture will be sustained.

Mr. WHITE. My friend the gentleman from Kansas, who is a member of the Committee on Agriculture, which reported this bill, has raised a specific question of order which affects the solemn judgment in this House last year as to the enactment of a law regulating the manner of distribution of seeds, plants, cuttings, &c. I may as well say I had the privilege, I felt it my duty, to offer the amendment which is the point in controversy.

Now, sir, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has reported the bill under consideration, which changes the law that we enacted last year, and the argument which he has seen fit to make is confirmation strong as logic can make it in favor of the accuracy of the point of the gentleman from Kansas. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] properly says that the old law enacted no rule upon this subject. He quoted correctly from the act of 1862, the organic act for the Agricultural Department, which provided that an agricultural department should be organized, at the head of which should be a Commissioner, who should purchase seeds for distribution, and so on, regulating in specific terms the manner of distribution by him.

So it was, and so the Department was administered for a long time. There was no controversy between members of Congress and the head of the Department. As application was made to the Department the Commissioner accommodated their requests as far as he could. About two years ago there was a sudden change, and we were left without any law whatever upon this subject. The Department was administered entirely according to the will—it might be the exercise of a proper will if you please—but without any specific law controlling the head of the Department. Now, sir, for the purpose of making a specific and clear rule upon that subject the statute of last year was passed. Was that the enactment of a permanent law? Or was it only a temporary provision? If it had the force and efficacy of a permanent enactment, then this is obnoxious, clearly, to the point of order made by the gentleman from Kansas under the rule, which provides—

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Now, that brings us to the exact terms of the statute which we enacted last year:

For the purchase and propagation and distribution as required by law—

That is by the law that regulates the Agricultural Department now—of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expenses of putting up the same, $80,000.

Now I call attention to this:

An equal proportion of three-fourths of all seeds, plants, and cuttings shall, upon their request, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their agricultural constituents, or shall, by their direction, be sent to their constituents, and the persons receiving such seeds shall inform the Department of the results of the experiments therewith.

There, sir, is a positive enactment, practically a supplement to the act of 1862, concurrent legislation for the control of the Agricultural Department. Now, then, the committee reporting this bill has seen fit to seek to change that law.

And in addition to what the gentleman from Kansas has said, I will show that it was the intention of Congress last year to make a permanent change of the law, because the concluding provision of that bill was in these words:

That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent or in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

I submit, then, once for all, that in the law of last year we made an actual, substantial, and specific change of the organic act of the Agricultural Department, and that is the law to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] hold that the Commissioner of Agriculture would not be required to distribute seeds among members in accordance with the provisions of the bill of last year, even should this provision in the pending bill be retained?

Mr. WHITE. I fancy so.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is what the Committee on Agriculture hold.

Mr. KEIFER. That is the interpretation which the committee puts upon this provision.

Mr. WHITE. That is the argument of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. In answer to the very pertinent question of the Chair, let me read the provision in this pending bill:

For the purchase and distribution according to law—

What law? The law of last year? No. If it stopped there, then I admit that your question would answer itself. But it does not stop there. It says:

For the purchase and distribution according to law, as provided in sections 526 and 527 of the Revised Statutes, of new and valuable seeds, plants, trees, shrubs, &c.

So, then, the first four lines of this provision, by referring to the statutes existing prior to the enactment of last year, repeals our enactment of last year.

The Chair is very familiar with the rule of law that where a subsequent enactment is so inconsistent with a prior enactment that both cannot stand together, then the latter enactment is a repeal of the former. I submit to the common sense and the legal intelligence of the present occupant of the chair that the statute of last year is a change of sections 526 and 527 of the Revised Statutes; and that this provision of the pending bill, if adopted, will be a repeal of our enactment of last year, and is therefore obnoxious to the point of order.

A word further. The organic act of the Agricultural Department provided a specific salary to be paid to the Commissioner of Agriculture, and also for the compensation of certain clerks. We have had in this House in different bills a proposition to change that salary. In 1874, in the agricultural appropriation bill, then reported from the Committee on Appropriations, there was a provision making the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture $3,000. I speak from memory. Last year or the year before, when the point of order was raised, it was decided that that provision of the appropriation bill of 1874 changed the organic act of the Agricultural Department in that particular, and that any new provision in a subsequent appropriation bill, except in the interest of economy, that sought to change that provision of the bill of 1874 was subject to a point of order. Therefore this is not a new question—it has been decided over and over again.

Mr. McGOWAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. McGOWAN. Is it not the fact that last year the salary of the Commissioner of Agriculture was made $3,500 a year, being a change by way of increase of his salary of the year before, and that change was sustained, although a point of order was made upon it? His salary was made $3,500 last year, and we have so reported it this year.

Mr. WHITE. That is not my recollection.

Mr. WILLITS. That is so.

Mr. WHITE. That is not my recollection. But I do not want to involve this point of order with contrary decisions made by a variety of chairmen. I will refer to the fact that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] and other occupants of the chair have made decisions in accordance with this point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it not entirely consistent with the language of the act of last year to hold that it is a limitation upon the use of the $80,000 appropriated in the bill of last year? Mark, the language is not that "hereafter" all seeds shall be so distributed. The act provides for appropriating $80,000 for the purchase and distribution of seeds and plants, &c., for the present fiscal year, and the provision in regard to the distribution, contained in the bill of last year, is solely in reference to the eighty thousand dollars' worth of seeds there provided.

Mr. WHITE. That is the very point; the only point there is in it. The opinion which the gentleman expresses is not my opinion, nor is that my reading of the law of last year. I think it was the intention of Congress when it enacted the law of last year to make it something more than a mere temporary provision.

Mr. McGOWAN. I want to add a word to what has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] as to the construction that can be given to the appropriation bill of last year. If gentlemen will read that bill for themselves—the Chair has already looked it over—they will find that no other construction can be given to it, except that it was a temporary provision applicable to last year's distribution of seeds. Let me read the provision as it was passed by Congress last year:

> For the purchase and propagation and distribution, as required by law, of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expenses of putting up the same, $80,000; an equal proportion of three-fourths of all the seeds and cuttings shall, upon their request, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution, &c.

What seeds and plants? The seeds and plants for the purchase of which that $80,000 was appropriated. The two portions of the provision are connected by a semicolon, showing them to be parts of the same clause; that it was only a temporary provision for the distribution of the seeds to be purchased by the $80,000 appropriated by that same paragraph. Any other construction of it would do violence not only to the language used in the section, but to all decisions upon similar points made by presiding officers of this House.

The chairman himself has struck into the middle of the very question at issue by putting to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the question whether if he is correct in his position with reference to the validity of the point of order, the provision in the act of last year would not stand as law regardless of the provision of the present bill. If the provision in the act of last year is permanent law, independent of the $80,000 then appropriated, the provisions of the present bill do not affect it. It is because the gentleman feels the force of this consideration that he desires to strike out this provision upon a point of order.

In addition to that, the reasonableness of the present provision is certainly very evident. The Committee on Agriculture, as its chairman has already said, has attempted in this bill to make such a distribution of these seeds as is provided in the statute, and that alone. But no such construction could be given to last year's appropriation act as is sought to be put upon it by the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to two decisions made in this session of Congress. Twice during this session I made a point of order in relation to some legislation in the appropriation bills of last year, which I claimed was not permanent legislation. In each case the Chair held that I was mistaken. I am not prepared now to say that the Chair was right in either of those cases. But once the Chair held that a clause relating to the pension law in a former appropriation act was a permanent provision, while to my mind it seemed to be a provision relating only to the appropriation for that fiscal year. A similar decision was made upon another appropriation bill of this year. But in neither of those cases was it so clear, I think, as it is in this act of last year, that the legislation was designed to be permanent.

This part of the act of last year relating to the purchase and distribution of seeds contains a clause which without being preceded by the word "provided" seems to be separated as an independent statement, not relating to the matter of appropriation or to the application of the money appropriated, but a general provision as to what shall be done in relation to the distribution of seeds, plants, &c.

I trust the Chair has the act before him; and I refer to a clause immediately succeeding the first principal clause, under the head "purchase and distribution of seeds," &c. It is separated from the first clause by a semicolon, and reads:

> An equal proportion of three-fourths of all seeds, plants, and cuttings shall, upon their request, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their agricultural constituents; and the persons receiving such seeds shall inform the Department of the results of the experiments therewith.

Now, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] in a ruling upon a proposition which I submitted, held that a clause in a law of last year, following the word "provided," was a clause that operated to make a permanent law, while I thought the clause related only to the application of the particular money appropriated in that bill. In this case we have, if possible, a more completely independent statement, making in my opinion a law that stands until repealed.

Now, I understood the Chair to have some doubt about what would be the operation of the clause in the bill before us to which the point of order applies. But I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that he and his committee would regard themselves as exceedingly unfortunate in carrying out their intention if they have not in the present bill changed the existing law on the subject of distribution of seeds and plants. They intended and desired to do that; and I think they have done it, if they can succeed in getting their bill enacted into a law.

Mr. McGOWAN. If the gentleman means by "existing law" the provision in the appropriation act of last year, he is right.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois.) The Chair is prepared to decide the question. In the opinion of the Chair, the repealing clause in the appropriation bill of last year does not repeal section 526 of the Revised Statutes. That bill, if regarded as of continuing force, only modified the provisions of that section in reference to the method of distribution of seed. Even if it be considered as making a permanent law with regard to the distribution of seed, the Chair does not yet see that the law of last year is inconsistent or in conflict with section 526. That section declares that seed shall be distributed among agriculturists. The purpose and scope of this provision of the act of last year under consideration is to the same effect. It merely provides that the seeds for which appropriations were then made should be distributed among agriculturists according to the direction of members of the Senate and House of Representatives. But the Chair is of opinion that the act of last year can only be construed as having the effect of prescribing the manner in which the amount then appropriated should be expended, and could only serve to limit the power of the Commissioner of Agriculture over, and to prescribe the method by which he should expend, the $80,000 then appropriated. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to ask the Chair this question: Is it the opinion of the Chair that the legislation of last year and sections 526 and 527 of the Revised Statutes should be construed together; that is, that they should be construed as lawyers say pari materia?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that they should be construed together, but the question has already been disposed of.

Mr. ANDERSON. I offer this as a part of the paragraph under consideration, and to follow after the words "eighty thousand dollars," in line 89.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Provided, That hereafter in making such distribution the Commissioner of Agriculture shall apportion three-fourths of the said seeds, plants, trees, shrubs, vines, and cuttings among the several congressional districts, States, and Territories, represented in Congress, according to their number and according to the demands of climate and soil; and he shall, upon the request of any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, distribute the quota due to the said district or Territory by him represented to such practical agriculturists therein as he may indicate, and the persons receiving such seed, &c., shall inform the Department of the result of experiments therewith.

Mr. ANDERSON. This amendment is not in conflict with the present bill in regard to the kinds of seed which shall be purchased and distributed. Nor does it require any member shall distribute these seeds unless he wishes to do so. Nor is it subject to the point that seeds which ought to go to the South will be sent to the North. This amendment corrects all that. The Commissioner would make that apportionment with reference to the soil and climate required for the particular kind of seed. It does provide that if a Member or Senator or Delegate shall request the Commissioner so to do, he shall then apportion three-quarters of the seeds, plants, cuttings, &c., for distribution among the several districts and States, and send the quota belonging to that particular district to practical agriculturists in that district. It furthermore provides these gentlemen who receive the seeds, trees, cuttings, &c., shall make report to the Department of their experiments.

I have no desire to detain the House at any length. I think the only question here is whether a member of Congress has not the right, if he sees fit to exercise it, to have the Commissioner of Agriculture distribute these seeds to his agricultural constituents. I have no desire to reflect upon the Commissioner. Everybody knows that he does not make this distribution. Everybody knows it is done by a clerk. I am frank to say that I know as much about the persons to whom seeds ought to go in my district as any person in that Agricultural Department. I think that is the whole point in this thing. I have been told by gentlemen on this side of the House that they are satisfied their districts have received a larger amount of seeds under the last law than ever before. It would be easy for the clerk to overlook a district. I know, of course, the bother which comes out of all this as much as any member on this floor; but I do say we have a right to know these seeds are being equitably distributed in our districts, and it is because of the interest I take in my district, that I have offered this amendment.

Mr. COVERT. Just one word in reply to the gentleman from Kansas. I promise not to occupy the attention of the Committee two minutes.

It seems to me that the question this committee is called upon to determine is not the question as to how many of my friend's constituents are benefited by the change in the existing law governing this matter, nor how many constituents of any member of the committee may be benefited by the reception of seeds each year from the Department. That is out of the question. Nor is it the question whether members of this committee or this House are subjected to trouble and worry and annoyance in consequence of this seed-distribution. That is not the question we as legislators ought to look at when we come to determine what should be done under this provision of the law and under the organic act creating this Department.

I again refer members of this committee to, and I desire to ask their very earnest consideration of, the proposition embodied in this bill, and that is, that these seeds shall be distributed among agriculturists, not among the constituents generally of my friend from Kansas, or among my constituents, or among the constituency represented by other gentlemen on the floor of this House.

And again, sir, in reply to his suggestion that this distribution is not made by the Commissioner of Agriculture, but is made by one of the clerks of the Department, I am in a position, Mr. Chairman, to say that my friend from Kansas labors under a misapprehension when he makes the statement that he uttered in this connection. I know the fact to be, and the fact is known to other gentlemen on the Committee on Agriculture, that the Commissioner of Agriculture is in close and constant communication with picked men in every county, town, and election district in every State in this Union; that he gets the names of the foremost men engaged in agriculture, members of county agricultural societies, men who have put themselves under covenant to him to report the results which may arise from the planting of these seeds sent to be experimented with and tested, and it is from these men he gets reports as to the result of the planting and cultivation of these seeds. The generality of the constituents represented by my friend from Kansas—and I do not desire to indulge in any invidious comments on his constituents, because the same kinds of people are represented by every member on this floor—the generality of them never make a report of any kind to the Commissioner in reference to the seeds distributed to them. If we are to carry out the spirit, if we are to carry out the genius of the law in reference to the Department of Agriculture and the distribution of these seeds, it seems to me they should be distributed in the way pointed out by the original act, and not by any such proposition as that which emanates from the gentleman who has just addressed the Chair.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I wish to ask if he does not know that the Commissioner of Agriculture now has one-fourth of all the seeds to be distributed?

Mr. McGOWAN. Mr. Chairman, eighteen years ago, after due consideration and careful examination of this whole subject, the Congress of the United States adopted these two sections of the statutes providing for the purchase and distribution of seeds. To read them will probably be news to many on this floor. The sections provide that—

The Commissioner of Agriculture shall procure and preserve all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by means of books and correspondence, and by practical and scientific experiments, accurate records of which experiments shall be kept in his office, by the collection of statistics, and by any other appropriate means within his power; he shall collect new and valuable seeds and plants; shall test, by cultivation, the value of such of them as may require such tests; shall propagate such as may be worthy of propagation; and shall distribute them among agriculturists.

SEC. 527. The purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture shall be confided to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another; and the purchase or propagation and distribution of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings, shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

Last year $80,000 was appropriated for this purpose. Sixty thousand dollars of that sum was distributed through members of Congress and not one in a thousand of the persons who received these seeds ever made a report. It was simply taking $60,000 of the people's money out of the Treasury and buying cabbage and turnip and white bean seed for our constituents, seed that they could have gone to the corner grocery and bought anywhere at ten cents a package. This is not in accordance with the language of the law. It is not in accordance with its spirit. The law means nothing unless it means that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall take the rarer seeds, the only kind that he can purchase, and distribute them generally to every portion of the country, from which reports may be made to him of the success or otherwise attending the attempt to use them, so that these reports shall be available and be of some service as agricultural information. The $60,000 of the money of the country which have been sent out in the manner in which I have stated last year, might just as well, so far as the benefit to agriculture is concerned, have been thrown into the fire. We have, Mr. Chairman, no more business or right to furnish white bean seed to the people at large, than we have to pay their doctors' bills. The statute is sensible, just, discreet, and the proposition to distribute these seeds is exactly the reverse. I hope the letter and spirit of the law will be adhered to.

Mr. BRAGG. One would imagine, Mr. Chairman, from listening to the argument made by the gentleman from Michigan, that every member of Congress of this House in order to find out what kind of constituents he has, and in order to become acquainted with them in his own district and their pursuits, would be compelled to go to the Agricultural Department. That he would have to ask for a letter from the Commissioner of Agriculture to know where the farmers lived in his district.

This money was originally intended to purchase rare seeds and distribute them. Has the Commissioner of Agriculture ever conformed to that provision in the purchase of rare seeds only, and their distribution in the latitudes and climates and soils well adapted to their propagation? Why, sir, he sends out wheat even, that is far inferior to the wheat that is grown in the sections of the country where he sends it. And further, even when he sends it out, he sends in connection with the wheat foul seed enough to spoil the best farm on the prairie.

I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas, and for this reason—that a member of Congress may know what the seed is that goes to his district, and know who gets it; and that it will not be as it heretofore has been, when you send a list to the Commissioner of Agriculture of seed for your constituents, that his clerks will return the list as having been filled and the seed sent, but when you return home you are met by requests and applications from your constituents and with statements that one man wanted winter wheat and he found, perhaps, that he had received in the place of it some species of corn which would require thirty days longer to mature than the kind grown in that section of country; and one who sent for barley would find that he had received some species of oats without a beard and entirely unadapted to that particular locality; and generally find that the farmers who have made these applications to you for particular species of seeds got exactly what they did not want.

And again, Mr Chairman, speaking of these rare and choice flower seeds sent out, you find that the rare and blooming hollyhock and other seeds of that class are distributed over the entire country.

I think we have the right to ask, and that our constituents have the right to receive what seed they ask for, and such as will be of some service or value to them. I think we have this right, and that we, who are as much governed by law as the Commissioner of Agriculture is, should say to him and to his clerks also who do this work, that we have the right to say what seeds shall be distributed in our districts and who shall receive them. And even though there be no report, the gentleman from Michigan knows that the growth of wheat in each locality requires each year a change of seed, although the new seed that may be sent may be no better than the original seed of the crop they are changing from. If there be no report from that seed the great work of the change of seed is going on and the agricultural interests of the country receive the benefit, notwithstanding the Agricultural Department, through its head, is not advised of the result.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 301) for the relief of William R. Wilmer.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 1381) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at or near Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 6062) donating certain lands in Lake County, State of Colorado, to the Veteran Union Association of Leadville, for hospital and burial purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 6613) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 6969) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 162) to grant the use of artillery, tents, &c., to be used at the soldiers' reunion to be held in Maine in 1881.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. PERSONS. I shall offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas to strike out the whole of that section of the bill that is now under consideration, from line 80 to line 89, and substitute therefor the law of distribution as now in existence. With the question as to the kind of seeds or how many are bought I have nothing to do. I do not propose any change in that. But I insist upon this, that the law that exists is very much better than that proposed, in that it allows any member of Congress, if he wishes, to claim a certain portion of the seeds. They need be no trouble to him. He can notify the Commissioner, as before, and have them sent to his constituents, or he can order them to his room and answer letters of application for them at his convenience. That is a right I think every member ought to have. Many of our constituents write for seeds, and heretofore it has been wholly within the discretion of the Commissioner whether he would send them one solitary paper of seeds.

The present law, therefore, is better for that reason. And it is better for another reason. The clause in this bill says he can only send to agriculturists. Now, a great majority of the seeds bought are garden seeds, and many of the best gardeners are in cities and in towns. Under this law he has no right to send them except to the farming population. I say that a member who is from the city of New York or from the city of Philadelphia has as much right to call for seeds to gratify or to favor his constituents as a man from any agricultural district in the rudest State of the Union. It is right, therefore, for that reason also.

Then there is another point. Heretofore you only appropriated money in bulk. You left it to the discretion of the Commissioner to buy seeds where he pleased, when he pleased, and how he pleased, and he made no report to this body, and there was not a solitary member of Congress, I apprehend, that ever knew where the Commissioner bought his seeds or what he did with the money. As the law is it puts him where we have a right to inquire into that. It says:

> That the Commissioner shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, from whom purchased, and the date of purchase.

It goes on to state what he shall do with them, so that it makes him accountable to Congress.

Here we are voting away $80,000 for seeds. You say he is to have his own list of correspondents; he wants men who will write back to him how the seeds he sent turned out; whether they were an improvement on the seeds previously sown in the localities of his correspondents or not. Under this law you have him to take $20,000 to do that; and $20,000, I apprehend, would furnish him with a most excellent list of seeds to supply his special correspondents from whom he desired information of this kind.

But the object of appropriating this money is not for information. It is to benefit the agriculture of the country. If the seeds are better than those sown there before, the people will take care of these seeds and propagate them, and the country will get the benefit. The great good that comes of distributing these seeds is in improving agriculture; and even if no man should answer directly what was the result, that good should not be denied the country.

Every member ought to have the right to call for seeds to send to his constituents. In that way seeds are distributed over the country; and members ought to know their districts better than the Commissioner. They ought to know better than any man in Washington can do where to send these seeds. It is a little trouble, but they should be willing to take the trouble.

I insist we continue the law as it is. I insist we have the right, as given under the existing law and not under the law proposed here in this bill, that we shall know where the Commissioner buys these seeds, from whom he buys, and what he does with them.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. WHITE. I want to ask the gentleman offering the amendment a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. If I am recognized as having the floor, I yield my time to my colleague, [Mr. PERSONS.]

Mr. COVERT. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PERSONS] will yield to me, I will move that the committee now rise.

Mr. PERSONS. I desire to withdraw my formal amendment and offer as a substitute for the pending paragraph that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For the purchase and propagation and distribution, as required by law, of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expenses of putting up the same, $80,000; an equal proportion of three-fourths of all seeds, plants, and cuttings shall, upon their request, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their agricultural constituents, or shall by their direction be sent to their constituents; and the persons receiving such seeds shall inform the Department of the results of the experiments therewith: Provided, That $3,000 of this sum shall be expended in the discretion of the Commissioner in experiments for the improvement of the varieties and culture of cotton: And provided also, That the Commissioner shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, from whom purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from sending flower, garden, and other seeds to those who apply for the same; and the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of improved and valuable seeds, plants, cuttings, and vines.

Mr. PERSONS. I wish to state that the substitute I have offered differs in nothing from the law of last year. I have been asked the question a time or two if I have made a change, and I desire to say that my substitute is the law of last year, except that I have struck out the provision in regard to the culture of tea, as that is contained in another portion of the pending bill.

Mr. McGOWAN. Do you mean the law as it is or the appropriation bill of last year?

Mr. PERSONS. The appropriation bill of last year.

Mr. WHITE. That is the law.

Mr. McGOWAN. Perhaps it is and perhaps it is not.

Mr. ANDERSON. I would inquire of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PERSONS] if his amendment avoids the point which has been made on the words "an equal proportion?"

Mr. PERSONS. It is the law of last year, giving three-fourths of the seeds to be equally divided between Senators, Members, and Delegates.

Mr. ANDERSON. The point I want to get at is this: under that rule it is held that the Commissioner may send us seeds that we do not want.

Mr. PERSONS. We will get seeds in the same way that we get books. I draw public documents that are of no earthly use to my constituents, and I exchange them with other members for documents that I do want.

Mr. COVERT. There seems to be some confusion and some misapprehension on the part of members as to the real meaning of the amendment submitted by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. PERSONS.] As the hour is now late, I move that the committee rise, so that the vote on this amendment may be deferred until to-morrow.

The question was taken upon the motion that the committee rise; and upon a division there were—ayes 67, noes 35.

Mr. AIKEN. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is not necessary to determine the motion that the committee rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask the gentleman to withdraw for a moment, that I may submit a request to the House.

Mr. ATKINS. I will yield for that purpose.

FUNDING BILL.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask consent that House bill No. 4592, to facilitate the refunding of the national debt, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, and is now on the Speaker's table, be printed with the Senate amendments in regular bill form, and also printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The bill, with Senate amendments, is as follows: [Strike out the parts in brackets and insert the parts printed in italics.]

An act to facilitate the refunding of the national debt.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all existing provisions of law authorizing the refunding of the national debt shall apply to any bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent. per annum which may hereafter become redeemable: Provided, That in lieu of the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and the acts amendatory thereto, and the certificates authorized by the act of February 26, 1879, entitled "An act to authorize the issue of certificates of deposit in aid of the refunding of the public debt," the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue bonds (1) [in the] to an amount (2) [of] not exceeding $400,000,000, (3) of denominations of $50, or some multiple of that sum, which shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum, (4) payable semi-annually, redeemable, at the pleasure of the United States, after 5 years, and payable (5) [ten] twenty years from the date of issue; and also (6) [certificates in the] Treasury notes to an amount (7) [of] not exceeding $300,000,000, in denominations of ten (8) [twenty, and fifty] dollars (9) or some multiple of that sum not exceeding $1,000, either registered or coupon, bearing interest at (10) [the] a rate (11) [of] not exceeding 3 per cent. per annum, (12) payable semi-annually, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, after one year, and payable in ten years from the date of issue (13); and no Treasury note of a less denomination than $100 shall be registered. The bonds and (14) [certificates] Treasury notes shall be, in all other respects, of like character and subject to the same provisions as the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," and acts amendatory thereto: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize an increase of the public debt: Provided further, That interest upon the 6 per cent. bonds hereby authorized to be refunded shall cease at the expiration of thirty days after (15) publication of notice that the same have been designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for redemption. (16) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to authorize public subscriptions, at not less than par, to be received at all depositories of the United States, and at all national banks, and such other banks as he may designate, for the bonds and for the Treasury notes herein provided for, for thirty days before he shall contract for or award any portion of said bonds or Treasury notes to any syndicate of individuals or bankers, or otherwise than under such public subscriptions; and if it shall happen that more than the entire amount of said bonds and Treasury notes, or of either of them, has been subscribed within said thirty days, he shall award the full amount subscribed to all persons who shall have made bona fide subscriptions for the sum of $2,000 or less, at rates most advantageous to the United States, and the residue ratably among the subscribers in proportion to the amount by them respectively subscribed, at rates most advantageous to the United States.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in the process of refunding the national debt, to exchange, at not less than par, any of the bonds or (17) [certificates] Treasury notes herein authorized for any of the bonds of the United States outstanding and uncalled bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent. per annum; and on the bonds so redeemed the Secretary of the Treasury may allow to the holders the difference between the interest on such bonds from the date of exchange to the time of their maturity, and the interest for a like period on the bonds or (18) [certificates] Treasury notes issued; (19) [but none of the provisions of this act shall apply to the redemption or exchange of any of the bonds issued to the Pacific Railway Companies;] and the bonds so received and exchanged in pursuance of the provisions of this act shall be canceled and destroyed; (20) but none of the provisions of this act shall apply to the redemption or exchange of any of the bonds issued to the Pacific Railway Companies.

SEC. 3. (21) [Authority to issue bonds and certificates to the amount necessary to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby granted; and] The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make suitable rules and regulations to carry this act into effect (22) [: Provided that;] and the expense of preparing, issuing, advertising, and disposing of the bonds and (23) [certificates] Treasury notes authorized to be issued shall not exceed (24) [one-quarter] one-half of 1 per cent.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, if in his opinion it shall become necessary, to use (25) temporarily not exceeding $50,000,000 of the standard gold and silver coin in the Treasury in the redemption of the 5 and 5 per cent. bonds of the United States authorized to be refunded by the provisions of this act, (26) which shall from time to time be repaid and replaced out of the proceeds of the sale of the bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act; and he may at any time apply the surplus money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as he may consider proper, to the purchase or redemption of United States bonds or (27) [certificates] Treasury notes authorized by this act: Provided, That the bonds and (28) [certificates] Treasury notes so purchased or redeemed shall constitute no part of the sinking fund, but shall be canceled.

SEC. 5. From and after the 1st day of (29) [May] July, 1881, the 3 per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation, or as security for the safe keeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with such banks; but when any such bonds deposited for the purposes aforesaid shall be designated for purchase or redemption by the Secretary of the Treasury, the banking association depositing the same shall have the right to substitute other issues of the bonds of the United States in lieu thereof: Provided, That no bond upon which interest has ceased shall be accepted or shall be continued on deposit as security for circulation or for the safe-keeping of the public money; and in case bonds so deposited shall not be withdrawn, as provided by law, within thirty days after interest has ceased thereon, the banking association depositing the same shall be subject to the liabilities and proceedings on the part of the Comptroller provided for in section 5234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States: And provided further, That section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, entitled "An act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and sections 5159 and 5160 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same are hereby, re-enacted.

(30) Sec. 6. That the payment of any of the bonds hereby authorized, after the expiration of five years, shall be made in amounts to be determined from time to time by the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, the bonds so to be paid to be distinguished and described by the dates and numbers, beginning for each successive payment with the bonds of each class last dated and numbered; of the time of which intended payment or redemption the Secretary of the Treasury shall give public notice, and the interest on the particular bonds so selected at any time to be paid shall cease at the expiration of thirty days from the publication of such notice.

SEC. (31) [6] 7. That this act shall be known as "The funding act of 1881;" and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

APPORTIONMENT.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have obtained from my friend Mr. T. B. Elliott, of the Treasury Department, two tables of calculations that are of interest and value in enabling us to judge of the apportionment most just to our several States and to the whole country, and ask leave to publish them in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The tables are as follows:

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6717) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department, reported it without amendment.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE REPORT.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 386) for printing report of the Life-Saving Service, to report it favorably, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides for printing 6,000 copies of the report of the operations of the United States Life-Saving Service for the year ending June 30, 1880, without the accompanying tables, (except the one showing the location of stations,) and without the accompanying reports on wreck-ordnance, for distribution among the officers of the merchant marine, through the collectors of customs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. WHYTE. I am also instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for printing 15,000 copies each of the second and third annual reports of the Director of the Bureau of Ethnology of the Smithsonian Institution, and I ask for the present consideration of the same.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BURNSIDE asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2200) for the relief of Jeremiah Brown; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HEREFORD asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2201) making an appropriation for the improvement of Big Sandy River in the State of West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

TENTS FOR INAUGURATION.

Mr. BALDWIN. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, and I ask the consent of the Senate for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 163) authorizing the loan to the committee on inaugural ceremonies of tents in the Government depots; and it was read three times, and passed.

PACIFIC HARBOR OF REFUGE.

Mr. GROVER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate for its information a copy of the report of the board of engineers lately engaged in examining the several points on the Pacific coast, for the purpose of locating a harbor of refuge, and especially that relating to Port Orford, Oregon.

MISSOURI RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. SAUNDERS submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to amend the river and harbor bill so as to increase the amount to be appropriated for the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri River between its mouth and Yankton, Dakota, to the sum of $1,138,000, that being the sum recommended by the Chief Engineer of the War Department as necessary to be expended for the improvement of the navigation of that part of said river during the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1882.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask that the resolution lie on the table for the present, and I give notice that on Monday after the routine business of the morning hour shall have been disposed of I shall ask the Senate to hear me for a few moments on the subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Nebraska.

GRANVILLE T. PIERCE.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the bill (S. No. 908) for the relief of Granville T. Pierce, which has been reported adversely from the Committee on Naval Affairs, be taken from the Calendar and recommitted to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

GREENLEAF CILLEY.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a bill upon the Senate Calendar to restore Greenleaf Cilley to the Navy. It has three times met the favorable report of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs; it has twice passed the Senate. It is, I believe, the only little bill upon the Calendar in which I feel an interest. I think it will incur no word of debate or discussion. I ask that the Senate will indulge me by taking up that bill and passing it.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. No. 1964) for the relief of Greenleaf Cilley, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to restore Greenleaf Cilley, now a commander on the retired list of the Navy, to the active list: Provided, That in case of such restoration said Cilley shall take rank in the list of captains: And provided further, That no claim for arrearages of pay shall accrue to said Cilley by reason of restoration under the provisions of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. Are there amendments as in Committee of the Whole? If not, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. McPHERSON. May I inquire what the bill is?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. McPHERSON. I shall object to the present consideration of that bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Leave has already been given to its consideration; the bill has been reported to the Senate; and the question is, shall it be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not know that any action had been had upon it that brought it before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There was action. The Chair asked if there was objection to its consideration and none was heard. The Chair then asked if there were any amendments as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has been the rule always to have a bill read before an objection is made to its consideration. I did not hear the demand of the Chair for objection or I certainly should have made objection to it.

Mr. WITHERS. I asked for myself that the bill might be read for information. It was read; and then the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. McPHERSON] not hearing it asked what bill it was.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the facts. The bill was read at length and the Chair asked if there was objection to its present consideration. He heard none. He inquired then for amendments as in Committee of the Whole, none were offered; and he directed the bill to be reported to the Senate; it was so reported, when the Senator from New Jersey inquired what was the nature of the bill. Those are the facts.

Mr. McPHERSON. Bills are called here by their numbers and it is impossible to know until the title of the bill be read exactly what is the nature of the legislation proposed to be acted upon.

With respect to this bill I wish to state that if the Senate is ready to consider it, it will probably take the rest of the day, if the Senate is to be sufficiently advised with respect to its character; and I think that at this late day in the session when so many bills are pressing, and bills of an important public character, we should not undertake to act upon a bill of this kind.

I wish to state with respect to Mr. Cilley that he has no more right to be placed upon the active list of the Navy than a man who had never been in the Navy. I think it is one of the worst cases of restoration that have ever been brought to the attention of the Naval Committee. Therefore I shall object at the present time to its consideration, and shall be ready on Monday, if the honorable Senator from Maine will postpone it until Monday, to give the Senate all the facts in relation to the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An objection does not carry the bill over. It is too late.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have sent for the original papers, and I shall have them here in a moment. I shall desire to be heard when they come in order to show what the facts are in this case.

Mr. JOHNSTON. When the Senator from Maine asked for the consideration of the bill, out of regard to him I interposed no objection to its consideration. I supposed the bill would take no time, but would pass at once, and I did not wish to interfere with the request of the Senator from Maine; but as it is manifest the bill is going to consume the whole time until the Senate will adjourn today, I move to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the cattle bill which we had up yesterday. I suppose that motion is in order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Nothing is in order now except the disposition of the bill pending.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Can I move to postpone that bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have moved to postpone the pending and all prior orders in order to proceed to the consideration of the cattle bill. That motion is in order, I presume.

Mr. HARRIS. If it be in order I move to postpone the consideration of the bill now before the Senate until Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That motion is in order.

Mr. HARRIS. I make that motion, and I make it because it is plain that the whole morning hour will be taken up with its discussion if it is proceeded with now; and I hope the Senator from Virginia will not press the motion but allow the Senate to proceed with the Calendar if this bill shall be postponed.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I must insist upon going on with the cattle diseases bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I did suppose when I asked the Senate to consider this bill that it would elicit opposition from no Senator in this body, last of all from the Senator from New Jersey. I had stated that it had three times received the favorable consideration of the Naval Committee. The Senator from New Jersey will recollect distinctly that in my interview with him within the last two days he stated that in consideration of that favorable action of the committee he would interpose no objection to the passage of the bill. Consequently I did suppose there was to be no objection to it. It is a bill simply to restore Greenleaf Cilley to the Navy. He was dismissed from the Navy upon the charge of intemperance, and the evidence which is adduced I think is satisfactory (certainly it was to the committee) that it was little more at best than a single offense; that he is a perfectly temperate man. The bill only restores him to a position which he lost by indiscretion, and such bills have passed this body year after year where it has been believed that an injustice had been done in the removal. It is not only true in the Navy, but equally true in the Army. I did suppose that the bill would receive the opposition of no Senator in this body. That was my supposition when I called it up. I think under the circumstances I will take the vote of the Senate and see what the Senate will say.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to ask the Senator from Maine if there be more than one bill pending in the Senate for the relief of Greenleaf Cilley?

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Maine is not aware that there is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. One bill for the relief of Greenleaf Cilley has already passed the Senate, on the 15th day of June, 1880.

Mr. COCKRELL. And it has gone to the House, a bill introduced by the Senator from Maine now addressing the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will read from the Journal:

On motion by Mr. BLAINE,

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill (S. No. 49) for the relief of Greenleaf Cilley; and having been amended on the motion of Mr. COCKRELL and the motion of Mr. CONKLING, the bill was reported to the Senate and the amendments were concurred in.

Ordered, That the bill be engrossed and read a third time.

The said bill was read the third time.

Resolved, That it pass, and that the title thereof be as aforesaid.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is a bill which the Senator himself introduced, and which I hold in my hand.

Mr. CONKLING. To what effect is the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is Senate bill No. 49, for the relief of Greenleaf Cilley.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Greenleaf Cilley, now a commander on the retired list of the Navy, to be a commander on the active list: Provided, That in case of such appointment said Cilley shall take rank at the foot of the list of commanders: And provided further, That no claim for arrearages of pay shall accrue to said Cilley by reason of restoration under the provisions of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That bill has passed the Senate and gone to the House of Representatives.

Mr. COCKRELL. It has gone to the House, and all the papers are in the House.

Mr. VANCE. May I inquire at what date that bill passed the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. On the 15th of June, 1880.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, can we know whether the bill that the Senator from Maine asks may be considered is a copy of the bill that has just been read by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill can be sent for. I sent for a copy but I had not time to compare them.

Mr. WHYTE. Let the pending bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 1964) for the relief of Greenleaf Cilley.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to restore Greenleaf Cilley, now a commander on the retired list of the Navy, to the active list: Provided, That in case of such restoration said Cilley shall take rank in the list of captains: And provided further, That no claim for arrearages of pay shall accrue to said Cilley by reason of restoration under the provisions of this act.

Mr. COCKRELL. The only difference between that bill and the bill that formerly passed the Senate is the proviso, "That in case of such restoration said Cilley shall take rank at the foot of the list of commanders," which is in the former bill, while this bill places him at the foot of the list of captains. That is the only difference between the two bills.

Mr. WITHERS. Does not one bill require that he shall be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, while the other puts him right on the list?

Mr. COCKRELL. I am speaking of the original bill. That bill was amended when passed by the Senate last June by inserting the words "nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint," and it was further amended so as to read "to be a commander on the active list. Provided, That in case of such appointment said Cilley shall take rank at the foot of the list of commanders." The word "appointment" was inserted there.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator state what committee reported the bill which was passed last June?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CONKLING. What committee reports the pending bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. The same committee.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The same committee evidently. I wish to inquire, by the record of the Senate, in what manner the bill already passed came before the Senate last June. Did it come as a report from the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. COCKRELL. It was reported by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE.]

Mr. MCPHERSON. The bill now before us appears to have been reported by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. The former bill as marked upon its face was reported without amendment by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. VANCE,] and it was introduced by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] The language is:

Reported without amendment by Mr. VANCE, on the 30th of April, 1880.

Mr. VANCE. I did not report the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be any mistake about the identity of the bill, the question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. HARRIS.] Is there a mistake as to the identity of the bill?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I renew the motion to postpone the pending and all prior orders in order to proceed with the cattle bill. I think that motion can be entertained.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The parliamentary motion is that moved by the Senator from Tennessee. The Senator from Virginia will have to move to postpone other orders before he can get to the cattle bill. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 30, noes 18.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. KERNAN, Mr. SLATER, Mr. FERRY, Mr. LOGAN, Mr. BAILEY, Mr. WHITE, Mr. SAULSBURY, and Mr. PENDLETON submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TELLER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROLLINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAUNDERS and Mr. VEST submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAILEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF ANIMALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] now moves to postpone the pending order, being the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the Anthony rule, for the purpose indicated by him.

Mr. BUTLER. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order has been announced, which is the consideration of the Calendar under the Anthony rule, and the Senator from Virginia moves to postpone it for the purpose indicated by him.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope we shall have the morning hour for the consideration of cases on the Calendar. Then we can take up the pleuro-pneumonia bill and give it consideration.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there any appropriation bill waiting to be proceeded with now?

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no appropriation bill, as I understand, waiting for consideration to-day; and I trust the motion of my friend from Virginia will be voted down until the expiration of the morning hour, and then we may take up his bill and act upon it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I take it for granted that the Senate will adjourn at the hour of two o'clock. No order has been made to that effect, but I presume it will do so; and as we commenced on the cattle-diseases bill yesterday and made some progress with it, I should like very much to-day to proceed with its consideration. One thing is certain, if it is postponed much longer it will be postponed for the whole session. I regard it as so important a measure that I desire to have it considered now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 22, noes 21.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia now moves to proceed to the consideration of the cattle-diseases bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2097) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and for the suppression and prevention of contagious diseases among domestic animals, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. MCPHERSON, in line 11, section 2, after the word "exportation," to strike out "and transportation;" so as to make the clause read:

"And make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall establish such regulations concerning the exportation of live stock as the results of said investigation may require.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The object of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] will be effected by leaving the words "and transportation" and adding the words "from said ports" after "transportation." I understand from him that that change is agreeable to him, and I make that motion instead of striking out "and transportation." The clause would then read:

Who shall establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation from said ports of live stock as the results of said investigation may require.

Mr. CONKLING. I venture to inquire of the Senator from Virginia, the mover, I believe, of this amendment, whether the effect of it is, or will be, to give preference by regulations of commerce to one port over another?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish the Senator would tell me how he avoids that objection. My suggestion to him is that this would result in the imposition of regulations of commerce upon one port not in fact applicable to others, and I think it is worth while to turn attention to that for a moment.

Mr. JOHNSTON. This section applies equally to all ports of the United States. There is no distinction made in the section itself between the various ports.

Mr. CONKLING. But if I understand the Senator's amendment its purpose is to denote a particular port.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that the amendment be read again.

The amendment was read.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Senator will refer to line 8 of the section he will see that the words I propose to insert allude to ports previously mentioned in the section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It evidently applies to all ports from which the exportation of cattle may take place. The whole context shows that.

Mr. CONKLING. As I come to this consideration quite fresh, having been absent for a day or two, it is more than likely that the inquiry I make has good answer, and that it is not worth while to press it; but I nevertheless venture to explain to the Senator from Virginia my meaning at least in this question. Here is a section, if I apprehend it, which can relate practically to no ports save those along the dividing line between the United States and the Dominion of Canada and such other ports, if any there be, certainly not all of them, as are affected by this provision, because they are concerned or likely to be in this trade. The Senator from Virginia moves to point the section more specifically by providing that investigation shall take place, and when it results in a good reason for doing so, the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the port to which that investigation of the facts may apply, shall make regulations touching the exportation and transportation of live stock from that port. Along with such an amendment to such a section, I read this provision of the Constitution:

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury makes under this amendment a regulation applicable to one port, or if it be in the plural to two or three ports, as the case may be which the investigation seems to point to, it seems to me that I see very clearly that that regulation, whatever might be its form, would in substance and effect operate upon certain denoted ports. If it would, and it imposed a restriction upon those ports, other ports have an advantage over them. If, on the contrary, it conferred permission upon those ports, they would have an advantage over the residue of the ports.

That is the point of my inquiry; and I repeat there may be nothing in it, because I make it upon an investigation too brief and casual to entitle me to feel much confidence in it myself; but I submit it to the Senator from Virginia as a lawyer and the manager of this bill, and I think it is well to say something about it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Secretary of the Treasury would make such a regulation as that, he would not do it under this proposed law. This measure applies equally to all ports of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senator departs from that statement will he allow me to make an observation?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. I find in section 3 the following language:

> But the provisions of this act shall not apply to cattle shipped from the Gulf States, or any of them, to the West India Islands.

Does the Senator from Virginia still say that under the provisions of this bill the regulations apply uniformly to all ports of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I was speaking with reference to this particular section, not to the whole bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator said "the bill."

Mr. JOHNSTON. I was speaking of this particular section. Whenever we come to the third section, if the provision the Senator has read is objectionable it can be amended; but the particular section under consideration makes no discrimination at all between ports.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. If so, I submit to him that it would be rather a large process of legislation by which the Senate should proceed to import into a bill a provision professedly unconstitutional if the other provisions of it were to stand, and put it in upon the theory that afterward the provisions which would make it unconstitutional may be eliminated from the bill. I would suggest to the honorable Senator that we had better go through with the bill and take from it those things which are insuperable objections, if they be such, to this amendment, and then put the amendment in when that will harmonize with the residue of the bill and not put it in conflict, as it will clearly conflict with the Constitution, with the other provisions.

Mr. JOHNSTON. After we arrive at the third section, which will be in a little while, we can consider whether that provision shall remain or whether it is unconstitutional.

Mr. INGALLS. That provision has been adopted, I understand, by a vote of the Senate, as an amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It has been adopted in Committee of the Whole. I hope this amendment will be acted on without further delay.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The provisions of this particular section apply to every port alike where upon investigation the Secretary is satisfied that disease exists, and by his regulations and orders he may make them apply to any port where he has reason to believe cattle are likely to be infected prior to their transportation to foreign countries for sale. For instance, to illustrate, in Portland, Maine, and in Boston, Massachusetts, there exists at this time no infection; it does exist in the city of New York. We merely give to the Secretary of the Treasury power to apply these restrictions and these limitations, and these rules, regulations, and requirements to such localities on the seaboard where the disease is known to exist and from which it is proposed to export cattle. That is all.

It is no violation of the Constitution at all. He can make it apply to Portland; he can make it apply to Boston if upon investigation the proper official reports to him that the disease is known to exist along the lines of transportation to those points or at those ports themselves. The object of that provision is that we may send abroad only cattle that can be sent with a clean bill of health; and without some regulation of this sort authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make a different requirement at different times in different ports, it will be impossible for him to do that. We want to remove the restrictions in England upon the importation of cattle from this country; and it may not be necessary to-day even to apply these regulations to Boston or Portland and it may be necessary to apply them to New York; but whenever the necessity comes let him have authority to apply proper regulations where they are needed.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think the objection of the Senator from New York can be obviated by adding to the section "but there shall be no preference to any port of the United States over the other ports."

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator think that would change it?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I submit to the honorable Senator that it makes neither one hair white nor one hair black. If the Constitution requires that, the Senator and I together can write nothing in a law which will change the requirement; and when we put on the face of this bill a transcript of the Constitution we impart no added validity to that instrument or its effect. Therefore if the Senator were to offer such an amendment I should take it as an admission that observing that provision of the Constitution he thought the language without such a provision would conflict with it; and if so, he would make a vain motion by putting that in a law.

And as I am on my feet, if I can have one further moment, I will make an observation about the second section. Of course, no Senator here is, in his own estimation or that of anybody else, to manifest an interest in an object of this sort peculiar to him or greater than that felt by other Senators, whether regarded as a question of locality or regarded at large, or viewed in any aspect. I take it there is no member of the Senate who has not at heart earnestly the purposes and objects of this bill, and I take it that that Senator will not be deemed an enemy of the bill who seeks to make it effective and who objects to having it in such form that it will encounter the mace of the court which may strike it down when it comes to operate. Turning to section 2, it seems to me that the Senator wants in that section to steer clear of another provision of the Constitution as well as that to which I have called attention. There is in the Constitution somewhere what has been called the vagrant clause, and it stands to this effect:

> The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

Along with that provision and a good deal older than that provision, in the fundamental law of all systems which tolerate legislative bodies is a practice hostile to the idea that legislative power can be delegated, that the Congress of the United States, itself the creature of the Constitution, the agent of the people and an agent acting under limited and enumerated powers, can bestow upon others discretion to wield or to waive those powers. This section 2 seems to me to delegate to the Secretary of the Treasury the power which in form is being exerted by the passage of this bill. It says to him that he is selected and deputized, on his motion, when his legislative conscience and judgment is satisfied, to do thus and so, and then the provision which we are considering, as it seems to me more and more, deputes him to do a thing which we cannot do ourselves.

If I be right in this, there is a double objection to this section, and the Senator I think will be compelled to make a provision not necessarily which shall operate all the time, but a provision which shall operate in a contingency and he may make that contingency if he chooses, the say so, certainly he might, of the President; whether of the Secretary of the Treasury I should doubt; but in an ancient instance, in the embargo case, it was held that an act of Congress which provided that a certain thing should occur upon the ascertainment of a fact by the President, one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government, and his promulgation of that fact, was well taken; it was operative and competent. At this moment it is not necessary to say whether such a function as that could be conferred upon one of the subordinates of the President. This goes quite beyond that. It does not provide what shall happen in a certain event; but it provides that a particular functionary of the Government upon being satisfied, not of anything certain in the bill, but of that which moves him or satisfies him, may proceed to do, we know not what, may proceed to do what the bill does not specify, but what he himself may afterward determine to be right:

The Secretary of the Treasury shall establish such regulations.

What regulations?

Such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live stock as the results of such investigation may require.

Mr. President, [Mr. GARLAND in the chair,] in your experience, which must have been somewhat long and somewhat varied, else you would not be able to evince as you do the results of your experience, did you ever happen to know an instance in which a State Legislature, more broadly clothed with power than the National Legislature, undertook to delegate to one executive officer legislative power, and then undertook to provide that in the exertion of that power his own judgment at large should govern him? Not that when satisfied he should do a particular thing, or institute a particular regulation, or announce or proclaim that a particular regulation should then for an indefinite or a fixed time become operative, but that he should evolve out of his own conscience such regulations, in the plural, as might then seem to him to be required by the investigation which he is authorized to conduct? Unless I have forgotten some instance there is no such one in the legislation of Congress. So I venture to suggest to the Senator from Virginia, who has acquaintance with this subject much beyond mine, that it would be well in shielding this section from some peradventure in some other forum which might paralyze it, to guard it not only in respect of a preference to be given to certain ports or a port over others, but to guard it from what is possibly the more radical objection to it, that it undertakes an asportation of power, a transfer of legislative power from the law-making authority of the country to one of the executive ministers of the law, to a man whose whole function it is within his own official province to execute the laws which Congress without him shall make.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, it is unnecessary for me to say that I sympathize very cordially with the ostensible purpose of this bill. I have read the measure with a great deal of care, and I desire to speak with deliberation and with caution; but I feel impelled to say that it is without any exception the worst bill that I ever read upon any subject. It is bad in principle; it is bad in theory; it is bad in policy, and worse in detail. Pleuro-pneumonia is unquestionably a great evil; but this remedy is worse than the disease. The bill is a confused, conflicting, incoherent, and incongruous medley and jumble of provisions, every one of which, in my judgment, is directly at variance with the Constitution and is at war with the reserved rights of the States and of the people. It creates a monstrous and anomalous machine, unknown to the Constitution and the laws, composed of the Commissioner of Agriculture, the National Board of Health, commissioners, inspectors, municipal and State and local police authorities, the Navy of the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury, responsible to no one and committing the Government to an indefinite and enormous expenditure for all coming time. It would be difficult for human ingenuity to devise within so narrow a compass a contrivance that embraced more principles that appear pernicious and doubtful, and doctrines that commit this Government to measures that are fraught and pregnant with immeasurable mischief for the future.

Mr. President, it would be a great misfortune if every steer in this country were to die; so it would be if every horse in the country were to die, or every sheep or every hog; but because that is so is the Government to purchase every sick animal in the country and pay for it at two-thirds of the value of animals that are well and marketable? Pleuro-pneumonia, as I said, is undoubtedly a great evil; but it is after all a question of private loss to individuals and to communities, and as such it is to be dealt with like other private calamities; and I am curious to know upon what theory of the Constitution or of the functions of Government this select committee have proposed this bill when they attempt to establish the principle that the Government shall purchase every sick and unhealthy animal in this country and pay for it two-thirds the value of a well one when everybody knows that a sick animal has no market value at all.

If this is to be adopted as the rule of governmental action, where is it to end? If we are to guarantee the owners of live-stock cattle against loss, why should not the owners of hogs be entitled to protection against the ravages of hog cholera, and the owners of horses against the epizootic, and the owners of sheep against foot-rot and scab? There is just as good reason for committing the Government to the policy of buying up these animals as there is of buying up meat stock or horned cattle.

Let us go further. Take corn and wheat and cotton; they are valuable articles of export and they are very largely productive of revenue to this Government, and it is very frequently the case that disaster falls on those who raise these grains and cereals and products over vast areas of country; and if this principle is to be adopted, why should not they be entitled to relief as well as men who raise meat cattle or live stock? Where is the difference in principle? I can see none. Drought and flood and locusts are great destructive natural agencies that are beyond individual control, and so is the cotton-worm, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] suggests, and the potato-bug, as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. ROLLINS] adds. These are great destructive agencies of nature that are beyond individual control, and if we are to adopt the theory that Government shall be responsible to individuals for losses accruing from these occasions, why should not all be entitled to benefaction from the Treasury?

I suppose, Mr. President, that this bill is justified by its proposers upon the constitutional provision that Congress has the right to regulate commerce between the States and with foreign countries. The Senator from Kentucky has given much attention to this subject and I ask him if that is not the theory on which the bill proceeds?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. It is, the Senator says. Then, as the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] has already suggested, there is a direct violation of the Constitution both in section 2 and section 3.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that in a recent case from Missouri the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that State laws restricting the importation of cattle and other property from an adjoining State are in contravention of the Constitution and that the power to regulate commerce and correct this evil rests in the Congress of the United States and not in the State Legislature.

Mr. INGALLS. Unquestionably.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And therefore the men interested in resisting this great national calamity that threatens the stock interest of the country have appealed to Congress and asked it to pass laws to give them the protection which the Constitution denies to the States the power to afford.

Mr. INGALLS. Unquestionably, Mr. President, but that power if it is to be exercised by Congress must be exerted in accordance with the Constitution; and it is entirely incompetent for Congress under the authority to regulate commerce between the States to delegate to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to make and establish regulations concerning one great and very important branch of commerce, which shall put the entire live-stock business of this country at the mercy of a totally irresponsible machine that is devised by this bill.

Aside from that, I will again call the attention of the Senator from Virginia who proposed this measure to the language in section 3:

But the provisions of this act shall not apply to cattle shipped from the Gulf States, or any of them, to the West India Islands.

Can anything be more flagrantly, more confessedly in violation of that clause of the Constitution which says that Congress shall give no preference to the ports of one State over the ports of another in any regulation that may be made? Will the Senator from Virginia state the reason why that provision was inserted?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Yes, sir, I can state it.

Mr. INGALLS. It was thought necessary to provide that if there should be in the Gulf States diseased animals, afflicted with pleuro-pneumonia, rinderpest, plague, murrain, or whatever they might have, they might be without objection exported to the West India Islands.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I can state to the Senator the reason why that was put in. Shall I give it now?

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to know it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. What is called the Texas fever is a disease that does not affect the animal who has it; the animal remains healthy and well, but by some unknown process communicates it to other animals, and they very often die from it. Such a fever exists in the State of Texas, and from that State the cattle take it to the West Indies where they have no herds of cattle. No damage could result by shipping cattle infected with Texas fever to the West Indies where they have no herds of cattle and where the cattle are merely butchered. The exception is put in to allow that trade to continue; but I agree with the Senator from Kansas that that provision is contrary to the Constitution and cannot be retained in the bill. It was put in for the reason I have given, but I am very willing to agree that that provision will have to be striken out.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Virginia, in his statement, has entirely usurped the functions of the bureau to be created by this bill; he has assumed to pass upon the nature, the danger, and the communicability of the Texas fever, and declares that in his judgment it is not a disease that would render cattle not a proper object of exportation from one port of this country to another country.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have only given a fact stated by veterinary surgeons; and it is a well-known fact.

Mr. INGALLS. So I say; but it appears to me that it would be a great deal better, if we propose to establish a bureau of animal industry with a corps of experienced officials, that they should be left to say whether or not cattle having the Texas fever could be appropriately and properly exported from one section of this country to the West India Islands.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The character of the Texas fever is as well known and well defined as any possible disease. It is perfectly well known that the animal himself is not affected by it; he is healthy and well; but by some means or other he can communicate the disease to another animal, he remaining all the time well and the other animal frequently takes sick and dies. That is the fact.

Mr. INGALLS. Now I will state to the Senator in entire good humor what I imagine this amendment was proposed to the bill for. I think it was placed there for the purpose of capturing votes in support of this bill from Texas and Louisiana and other States in that neighborhood where this disease prevails. Of course I make the statement in entire good humor, but that is my judgment of what this amendment was placed in the bill for, and I am very glad to hear the Senator from Virginia state that he intends to withdraw it.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will permit me I will state that the provision was placed in the bill because a great many cattle are exported from the Gulf ports of the United States to the West India Islands, and going to a country where the climatic conditions of the country are the same or nearly the same, they communicate no such disease as it is thought may be communicated to cattle further north. There is no objection in the West India Islands to receiving the cattle from the Gulf ports. They carry no disease there, and a very large trade in cattle is done from our Gulf ports, especially the ports of Texas, to those islands. That was the reason that provision was inserted.

I will state further that the constitutional difficulty referred to was not overlooked. I do not believe it necessary to incur the same expense, make the same preparation, appoint the same officers, and impose the same burdens on ports where no cattle are shipped and where no danger exists, that we do where there are large shipments and manifest danger. Nobody pretends that any danger of spreading disease results from shipments to cattle from the Gulf ports in the United States to the Gulf islands. These islands want our cattle and we desire to furnish them. It is a lucrative trade especially for Texas, and I can see nothing in the Constitution requiring that it be hampered with restrictions because there is danger from unrestricted shipments from other ports though none from these.

I do not believe, so far as I am concerned, that it is necessary to take precautions at ports where there is no danger. I do not believe that these are privileges in the sense signified in the Constitution given to one port over another; I believe they are precautions. I think they are in the nature of exemptions from burdens that are not necessary on some ports but which a public danger requires shall sometimes be placed on others.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the explanation made by the Senator from Texas why this amendment was placed in the bill is entirely satisfactory to me, and it fortifies the position I first assumed that the committee proposed it because otherwise the Senators from Texas, Louisiana, and the other States in that locality would not assent to the bill.

Mr. COKE. If you will allow me I will say that when the bill was reported I gave notice of an intention to oppose it. I gave notice that I did not concur with the committee and would endeavor to defeat the bill.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to say that if the purpose of putting that amendment in was to capture my vote as one of the Senators from Texas, it has failed, because I regard the whole bill as at war with the theory of our Government, as centralizing power here, as depriving the States of their reserved rights, and as the longest stride to centralization of any bill I have ever seen since I have been a member of this body.

Mr. INGALLS. I am very glad to have my opinion corroborated by an authority so eminent as that of the Senator from Texas, [Mr. MAXEY.] But I desire to call the attention of the Senate to some of the details of this bill, and in the first place I will advert to the machinery that it proposes and the expense of its administration.

It provides that there shall be in the first place a chief of the bureau of animal industry whose salary shall be $3,000 per annum; that there shall be two commissioners, one of whom shall be a practical business man, and the other a practical stock man, who shall have a salary of $3,000 each, which is $6,000. It provides further for an agent in every State and Territory in the Union whose duty it shall be to collect statistics, to be reported to the chief of the bureau, each one of whom is to be paid at the rate of $10 per day, which makes an annual pay-roll of $141,000. Added to that is the clerk who is to receive a salary of $2,000 per annum. Then there are certain inspectors to be appointed along the line between Canada and the United States and along every railroad line from the West to the seaports of the East, who are also to receive salaries, but whose number and whose compensation are not named.

Then the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to employ the officers and men and vessels of the revenue marine service in carrying out the provisions of this bill. Then there is an additional compensation to be allowed at the rate of $10 a day to the members of the Board of Health for their services in connection with this business. And in addition to the absolutely specified expenditures there is an indefinite and elastic item of traveling and other expenses while carrying out the provisions of this act.

Mr. President, this bill cannot be made operative in the manner provided by the committee without an annual expenditure, for salaries and compensation and traveling expenses alone, of $200,000. And what do you add to that? You add the still further provision, the most extraordinary and anomalous that was ever inserted in any legislative enactment, that every animal in the country that is diseased or infected, or that is suspected of being diseased, shall be isolated and slaughtered, and that the United States Government shall pay for every animal so slaughtered a sum not exceeding the value of two-thirds of the market rate at which healthy animals are selling. Those who are better advised than I am as to the statistics of pleuro-pneumonia and the other cattle diseases of this country can estimate what the expenses under this bill will be for that item.

Mr. President, I said that this bill was an anomaly, that it created a monstrous machine. It is a hydra-headed monster; it is a regular octopus, a legislative devil-fish, with its arms extending in every direction, and grasping within its pernicious embrace every feature of one of the most valuable industries of this country, without one single particle of responsibility to any source whatever. And yet this select committee, selected on account of their peculiar knowledge of the requirements and the necessities of this occasion, present this to us and ask us to pass it, practically under the operation of the previous question, committing the Government to a confessed and admitted expenditure for practical details alone of more than $200,000 per annum, and to the other item of the slaughter of infected animals the amount of which no man can predict. I have generally supposed that if an animal was sick, if it was diseased, if it had pleuro-pneumonia or lung fever, it had no market value. What is the market value of an animal that has got pleuro-pneumonia and is just about on the verge of dissolution? It is a menace to every other animal that is within communicable distance. And yet this bill provides that this machine may isolate all animals that are infected or diseased, and not only that, but all animals that it is suspected may be diseased, or, in the language of one other section of the bill, have presumably been exposed to contagion, and slaughter them, and then pay the owners of them out of the Treasury of the United States two-thirds of the market value of healthy animals of the same description.

Mr. President, I cannot find language sufficiently strong to characterize my understanding of a provision like that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do I understand him that he is treating the bill as authorizing, and that he proposes to have the Senate understand that the bill authorizes, the commission to go into a State and kill indiscriminately cattle suspected of being diseased?

Mr. INGALLS. I do say exactly that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will examine the bill he will see that that matter is left to the States. The commission suggest regulations, make investigations and report to the authorities of the States the result of their investigation, and when the States adopt the measure to stamp out disease within their borders then the National Government proposes to compensate the owners of the cattle slaughtered, by allowing two-thirds of their value. I will say to the Senator that the committee felt that the man whose cattle were slaughtered whose property was destroyed for the public use and for the common good, ought not in good conscience and equity to be required to sustain the loss.

Mr. INGALLS. Why not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Because they are slaughtered for the public good.

Mr. INGALLS. What are they worth? What is a sick animal worth, an animal that has the pleuro-pneumonia and is just about to die?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator convinces me that he has never investigated the subject at all if he understands it so. There may be but one or two cattle really sick, and yet the whole herd may be so infected as to require that the last one shall be slaughtered to prevent the spread of the disease. That thing was done in the State of Massachusetts; it was done in the State of Connecticut; it is being done to-day in the State of New York, and the State authorities are paying for every one of the cattle that is slaughtered. The efforts of the States having been found wholly inefficacious, because if they stamp it out within their borders they are assailed by new invasions from the adjoining States, and the evil being so monstrous and so great that it is perfectly evident that it is impossible for the States themselves in their separate capacity to grapple with it, this committee have proposed this bill which I believe the Senator has called a "boa-constrictor"——

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir, an octopus.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A "devil fish." The committee believe it is the only proposition strong enough to strangle the life out of this disease, which may attack whole herds of our not less than fifty million cattle.

Mr. INGALLS. How many diseased animals are there in the country to-day?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I cannot tell; but I know very well the most eminent veterinary surgeons in America who were before our committee said it would take more than a million dollars to stamp out the disease in New York and New Jersey.

Mr. INGALLS. This bill provides $200,000, of which the entire amount is to be expended in clerk hire and salaries.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think so. I will reply to the Senator after he is through.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky has called my attention to one feature of the bill that I will now advert to, and that is the relations of the proposed bureau to the local and State and municipal authorities. He says that there is to be no co-operation until the States have accepted the provisions of this bill and the regulations adopted by this anomalous hydra-headed machine that the bill proposes to create. Let me call attention to section 3 of the bill.

The Commissioner of Agriculture, through said chief of bureau, acting with the National Board of Health—

But that has been stricken out—and the commissioners provided for in section 1 of this act, when deemed necessary, shall co-operate with and aid State and municipal authorities—

And not only that, but—

and corporations and persons—

Meaning railroad companies and steamship lines and all those engaged in stock-raising—in establishing regulations for the safe transportation of such stock from the interior to the seaboard and the shipment thereof, so that such stock may not be exposed to said disease, and shall also co-operate—

That is with regard to the co-operation of this bureau with the State authorities—and shall also co-operate with State and municipal authorities in the suppression of said diseases by aiding in carrying into effect their laws and regulations, by advising or assisting them in establishing regulations for the isolation of any cattle suspected of having said diseases and the slaughter of those ascertained to be so diseased.

I said that this bill was contradictory and inoperative, because it declared in that section that this bureau of animal industry should co-operate with the States in carrying out regulations already existing, and then provides in section 6 that it shall establish a new system of rules and regulations to be submitted to the States, and that it shall not co-operate with them until they are adopted.

Mr. MAXEY. With the consent of the Senator from Kansas, who is expressing my own views much better than I could myself, I desire to call his attention to section 5 in connection with the point which he has made that this does interfere with the States:

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful to import or introduce into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State, Territory, or district from another State, Territory, or district, or to sell or offer for sale any domestic animal affected with such diseases, or has been exposed presumably thereto, except in accordance with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations adopted in pursuance thereof.

Under that provision I ask the Senator from Kansas if my colleague here should propose to sell me stock, both being citizens of Texas, which has been presumably liable to disease, but not knowingly, because the word "knowingly" is not in, what prevents that offer being under this bill an unlawful act? Then under section 11 the offenses created by this act are triable in the Federal courts. We are both citizens of the State of Texas; an offense is made which is not required to have been committed knowingly, both of us being citizens of that State, and he for offering to sell me that stock is liable to be indicted in the Federal courts.

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly. I shall come to that section; I had made a note of it.

Not only is what I have just said strictly true, but after declaring that every animal suspected of disease or known to be diseased shall be isolated and slaughtered and be paid for by the Government, section 5 goes on to declare that this board may make regulations and rules to allow animals of that kind to be introduced into the country. It makes an express provision declaring that this board may make rules and regulations for the very purpose of admitting diseased animals into this country, in section 5—

Except in accordance with the provisions of this act, and the rules and regulations adopted in pursuance thereof.

Thereby declaring that this board may make rules and regulations which will render it lawful for a person to introduce into this country diseased animals affected with any contagion whatever. And in connection with the observation made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] who was last on the floor, I will say that section 11, after creating new classes of crime and inflicting new kinds of punishment, makes offenses under State laws triable in United States courts, and declares that the United States attorneys shall prosecute all such offenses.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The section the Senator is talking about now does not refer, and was not intended to refer, to cases between individuals in the same State. It refers, and was intended to refer, to cattle sought to be imported or brought from other countries into the United States, or taken from one State to another or one Territory to another. It does not relate to private sales between individuals in the same State, but to sales for the purpose of exportation from one State to another. That is the purpose of the section, though it may be awkwardly expressed in the language of the provision.

Mr. INGALLS. The language of the section is this:

That it shall be unlawful to import or introduce into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State, Territory, or district from another State, Territory, or district, or to sell or offer for sale any domestic animal affected with such diseases—

I pass over the beautiful grammar of the next clause, "or has been exposed presumably thereto," and come to—

except in accordance with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations adopted in pursuance thereof.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Exactly.

Mr. INGALLS. That is to say, they may be introduced in pursuance of the rules and regulations made by this bureau of animal industry.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Exactly. The latter part of that section refers to the previous part of the bill which authorizes rules and regulations to be established for transportation from one State to another, or from foreign countries to the United States. The rules and regulations here referred to are those.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator from Virginia to tell me this: Under section 5 is it not within the power of this bureau of animal industry to make rules and regulations providing for the importation of diseased animals into the United States?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, it is not.

Mr. INGALLS. Well, Mr. President, the power of human assurance certainly never did further go—

That it shall be unlawful to import or introduce into the United States from foreign countries * * * any domestic animal affected with such diseases * * * except in accordance with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations adopted in pursuance thereof.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The bill provides for the exercise of the power of establishing quarantine. Of course all animals brought from foreign countries will be subject to the quarantine regulations. In case animals are imported which have the disease the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make regulations in regard to such animals.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Kansas permit me to call his attention to a view of this section? I think some of the criticisms which the Senator from Kansas has made upon this bill are sound, and probably they will be met by the Senate before the bill passes through by amendments calculated to make its meaning clear. I desire to call his attention to the present criticism which he is making, and ask him whether on reflection he adheres to it.

As I understand him, he says that section 5 contains the absurdity of providing that diseased animals may be imported into the United States, animals infected with contagious and infectious diseases, in accordance with the rules and regulations of this commission. I do not so read the sentence. I understand that the section applies not only to diseased animals, but animals which have been exposed to disease, and it goes on to say that neither of those two classes shall be imported except in accordance with the provisions of this act and the rules and regulations established therein. It is not enough that the person importing shall show that he is complying with the rules and regulations; he must also bring himself within the provisions of the act. Now, there is nothing in the act which permits or provides for the importation of a diseased animal at all. That is called in when you provide for the importation of an animal which has been presumed to be exposed to the disease, and that is provided for. It may be that such animals, not diseased, but simply having been exposed to disease, may, after certain provisions in regard to quarantine and inspection having been complied with, be allowed to come in. If this section goes into effect, it simply will be that no diseased animal can be imported, because there is nothing in the act which permits that, and there is an express prohibition in the sixth section against importing such an animal at all, unless you find somewhere else a license, but that other animals not diseased, but which may have been on an infected ship, may, after the quarantine regulation and inspection provided for by the act have been gone through with, come in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, to make that view of the Senator from Massachusetts perfectly clear, I will just make a short statement. Take the case of New Jersey, where everybody knows that this disease exists in almost every county in the State. It may make its appearance in a herd on the Jersey side of the Hudson River. We may see in the herd of my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON,] who has great familiarity with this subject, two or three animals that are infected with this disease. That provision is put in the fifth section in order that the veterinary surgeons may make rules and regulations by which the rest of the herd may be taken over to New York or somewhere else, and slaughtered in particular slaughter-houses, because their beef is as good as that of any other animal until the disease has taken hold of it and destroyed its value. It is to save them; to enable the board of commissioners to provide a regulation and a plan by which animals suspected can be taken immediately and slaughtered for the purpose of their meat being sold. That is the object of it, to make rules and regulations for the destruction of herds that are suspected of being infected or are liable to be infected.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, even with the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] this section is absurd, because he says that there are no provisions in this act that authorize the importation or introduction of diseased animals into the country, and yet the section recites that they shall not be so introduced except in accordance with the provisions of this act. Therefore the section is untenable, and involves an absurdity in addition to being open as I contend to the construction I have placed upon it.

But I was proceeding, when diverted by the Senator from Texas, to call attention to the inconsistent provisions of this bill as to the time when it is to become operative. I had read from section 3 that this board was directed to "co-operate with State and municipal authorities in the suppression of said diseases by aiding in carrying into effect their laws and regulations," meaning the laws and regulations of the States already existing. Here is an intrusion of the national or Federal authority into the affairs of a State, and directing that this board, national or Federal entirely in its constitution, shall go into a State and co-operate with the State authorities in carrying out strictly State, local, and municipal regulations.

The Senator from Kentucky said that I was wrong in saying that this bill provided that this board should have the authority to isolate and slaughter cattle under these circumstances, and yet in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth lines of the section that I have referred to the language is—

Cattle suspected of having said diseases, and the slaughter of those ascertained to be so diseased.

Now I ask the Senator, and those interested in this bill, to turn to section 6, the amendment proposed by the committee. Having already declared in section 3 that the commissioners shall co-operate with the States in carrying into effect their laws and regulations already existing, this bill provides by way of amendment:

That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture, through said chief of bureau, in connection with the National Board of Health, to prepare such rules and regulations as they may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory.

And when shall this become operative?

And whenever any State or Territory shall accept the same, then it shall be the further duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture, through the said chief of bureau, and the commissioners and agents authorized by this act, in connection with the National Board of Health, to assist in such State or Territory in the execution of such rules and regulations.

Which of these two provisions is operative?

Mr. JOHNSTON. If the Senator will permit me I will make an explanation of that. Disease is known to exist now in several States of the Union, New Jersey, for example, Pennsylvania, New York, and perhaps others; but in those three at any rate. Those States have already passed laws in regard to these diseases, especially pleuro-pneumonia, which are now in operation. The object of this provision in the bill was to enable the United States to assist in the execution of these laws in the States where the diseases now exist and then in the States which they have not yet reached to establish a uniform system of rules and regulations and co-operation between the States and the United States. That is the whole object of it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Constitution of the United States provides that all laws shall be uniform in their operation all over the United States, and if the Senator from Virginia thinks that the suggestion he has made is one that comes within that provision of the Constitution I congratulate him upon his perceptive faculty. He deliberately proposes in the same bill to declare that this board shall carry out existing State rules and regulations and laws, and then that in other States regulations and laws and rules shall be prepared by this board to be submitted to them and not become operative until they have been accepted by the States. How are they to be accepted by the States, by the executive or by the Legislature?

Mr. JOHNSTON. By the Legislature, of course.

Mr. INGALLS. By the Legislature. In the great majority of the States where this measure would become effective and valuable, the Legislatures have biennial sessions. They are mostly in session now; they will adjourn within the next fifteen or twenty days; and if this provision is to go into effect there cannot be one single thing done under this bill before 1882.

Mr. WILLIAMS. They can be convened in extra session.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well; of course they can be called together in extra session; but I am calling attention to the provisions of this bill as they affect existing organizations. Under the amendment proposed by the committee to section 6, the provisions of this bill cannot in the ordinary progress of affairs become operative before 1882, and when they do become operative section 7 declares what is to be done:

That when the Commissioner of Agriculture is notified by the executive of any State or Territory of the acceptance of said rules and regulations, such sum as may be deemed necessary for the purchase and slaughter of all diseased or infected animals, or animals suspected of disease—

That is to say they are to be killed on suspicion—

in the State or Territory in which the outbreak has occurred shall be awarded from the fund hereinafter appropriated for this purpose.

It is a matter of very serious practical consideration to inquire to whom this money is to be awarded, and by whom it is to be awarded, the amount that is to be awarded, and the persons by whom suspicion is to be attached to animals so as to render them purchasable under this act. The section goes on:

Provided, however, That a sum not exceeding two-thirds the market value of a healthy animal shall be allowed for an infected or diseased one, and a sum not exceeding $100 may be paid in special cases, but no animal shall be considered of special value unless he be purely bred, and the pedigree found duly recorded in a well-established herd-book.

I suppose under the provisions of this bill it is intended to pay only for bulls or steers, the male pronoun being used before the words "purely bred." But I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this provision commits the Government to the payment for animals admitted to be worthless of two-thirds the value of healthy animals of the same class.

There is another provision in section 8, to which I want to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia who reported the bill. Here is a direct infraction of the constitutional provisions as to the power of Congress to interfere in State affairs. The eighth, ninth, and tenth lines declare that removals from one State to another shall be unlawful—

Except in so far as such removals shall be made in accordance with the rules and regulations for which provision is made in section 6 of this act.

Now, I assert that no provision whatever is made for removal in section 6 of the act. Section 6 refers to an entirely different class of subjects. It has nothing to do with the removal of animals from one State to another, but it provides what rules and regulations shall be established for the extirpation and suppression of disease by the isolation and slaughter of the animals. That section is certainly open to objection as being entirely inoperative and ineffectual, because in section 6, to which section 8 refers, there is no provision whatever made for removal from one State to another.

I have alluded to the fact that this bill provided an extraordinary number of new crimes and methods of punishment, but in section 10 the committee say:

That any person, company, or corporation who shall knowingly violate the provisions of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than one hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both fine and imprisonment.

If the Senator will state how it is possible to imprison a corporation, he will instruct the Senate. It declares that any corporation which knowingly violates the provisions of this act shall be fined and imprisoned.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Punished by fine or imprisonment.

Mr. INGALLS. "Or by both fine and imprisonment."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. We can fine a corporation.

Mr. INGALLS. There is one other objection to this bill which is, I think, fatal to it; and that is that it provides no period of limitation. Under the terms of this bill, should it become a law, there is created a separate, independent bureau of the Government, costing, as I have already said, an enormous sum of money, and committing the Government to an indefinite expenditure and without any limitation whatever of time. It is to continue, so far as this bill at least is concerned, as long as the Government shall endure.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Congress can repeal it.

Mr. INGALLS. In order, Mr. President, to test the sense of the Senate on the constitutional objections to the bill as indicated in sections 2 and 3, I move to strike out, in lines 9 and 10 of section 2, the words "Secretary of the Treasury" and insert "Congress," and to strike out the word "who" after "Treasury" and insert "which;" so as to read:

And make report of the results of such investigation to Congress, which shall establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live stock, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The Chair will state there is already an amendment pending to section 2, offered by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.]

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF ANIMALS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2097) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and for the suppression and prevention of contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I hope I shall not detain the Senate long, Mr. President. The bill submitted by the select committee of which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. JOHNSTON] was chairman originates from these causes. A number of years ago in Great Britain the disease of pleuro-pneumomia existed extensively and caused to the people of that country an enormous loss of money. Immense numbers of cattle died, and immense sums of money were expended in stamping out the disease, as the phrase goes. This being so, they are naturally desirous of preventing the reintroduction of the disease into that country. Within the last two or three years an extensive exportation of live stock from this country to that country has grown up. Commencing in a mere experiment, it has now grown until there are millions of dollars' worth exported in a year. But the exportation of our cattle there is embarrassed by the fear of the British people that those cattle will reintroduce this disease into their country; and therefore, knowing that this disease does prevail in a number of our States, they provide that when cattle are shipped from our shores to England they shall not be permitted to land and be sent out into the country, but shall be slaughtered within a very short time, three or four days, after their arrival, whatever their condition may be. We all know that the passage of steamers from this country to Europe is sometimes a rough one, and that a shipment of cattle going to England during one of these rough passages arrives there in bad condition. If it could so be that the cattle thus arriving in this condition could be allowed to go into the country, remaining one or two weeks or a month to recover from the effects of the voyage, they would be much more valuable than they are if slaughtered immediately on their arrival in their unfit condition.

As I have said, this disease prevails in our own country, but it prevails east of the Alleghany Mountains and not west; and yet the great bulk of our cattle industry, if I may use the expression, is west of the Alleghany Mountains, and the people in that section of the country find themselves in this condition, that because their cattle must pass through States in which this disease exists they are subjected to the embarrassment, the loss, the difficulty imposed by the orders of the privy council in Great Britain for their immediate slaughter after they arrive there. Therefore the object of this bill is to provide, in the first place, some means by which our exportation of foreign cattle can be relieved from this difficulty.

Another object of the bill is to prevent the spread of the disease, it being a contagious one, from the States east of the Alleghanies where it does exist into the States west of the Alleghanies where it does not exist. That is the second purpose of the bill; and it seemed to this select committee that it is a very important thing to do, if it can be done. The cattle trade of the West is a somewhat important item in the business of this country to-day. If I am not mistaken there were nearly a million and a half of cattle handled in the single city of Chicago last year. If that represents half of the entire cattle trade of the western country, there must be nearly three millions of cattle produced yearly to add to the wealth of this country. Giving a small estimate of their value, that item cannot be less than $100,000,000 a year. Now, if we could imagine $100,000,000 a year capitalized in money and owned by some half a dozen men, I apprehend there would not be any very great difficulty in getting the Congress of the United States to consider any question that might be raised or mooted here with reference to the care and protection of that accumulated capital; but this is an annual production of wealth, understand; and there are not six men or seven, but as many millions behind it. It may be that because it represents the production of $100,000,000 a year instead of $100,000,000 of capital, and because it has behind it six or seven millions of men instead of six or seven men, there is reason why it has been so difficult to have this question considered in the Congress of the United States. It is just this, Mr. President, and things like it, it is just the cotton of your country, the tobacco of your country, the cattle of your country, the breadstuffs of your country that enable you to bring about resumption and enable you to maintain resumption. It is just these things which will enable you to sell, if you can sell, the bonds you provided for in your funding bill yesterday; and it is just these things which will enable you to pay the interest on those bonds as it becomes due.

Because of these difficulties, the one as to the exportation of our cattle abroad and the other the danger of destroying this great industry in the Northwestern States and the Southwestern as well, the select committee brought before the Senate the bill now under consideration. I understood the Senator from Kansas to say that he was earnestly and heartily in favor of the object sought to be accomplished.

Mr. INGALLS. I said the "ostensible object."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes, "the ostensible object," meaning thereby, I suppose, that the committee in reporting the bill did not intend to provide for the object I have named, but for some other object, which the astuteness of the Senator from Kansas had enabled him to discover.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not intend to intimate that the committee had not considered it and intended to carry out the object proposed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I did not know but what the Senator thought otherwise.

Mr. President, it would be a mere pretense for me to say that this bill in all its parts meets my approbation, because I submitted to the Senate some time ago a bill, not originated by myself but compiled from the bills of others, which expressed more nearly and more clearly the views I have on this subject than this bill does; but I have found in somewhat a long experience in life, that in order to effect any object where many minds must be consulted, there are but few men—and I am not one of them—who can have done the thing just precisely as they want to have it done; that where many minds must be consulted, there must be a concession, a yielding of views and opinions, in order to have a common mind represented by a common bill. In order to get the matter before the Senate and have some consideration of it at this session by the Senate, and as I hoped then by the House, I consented to the introduction of this bill as reported. There are in it things that I did not like; the machinery in it I did not like; but I hoped that when it reached the Senate it would be taken up in the spirit of doing something to accomplish the end proposed practically, and that it would not be met, as it appears it has been met, in a spirit of hypercriticism, in a spirit that searches through it for reasonable and as I must think unreasonable objections, but that an effort would be made to amend it where it needed amendment, or that if it were conceived to be incapable of amendment that the same degree of research spent upon it by the Senator from Kansas who has just spoken in finding fault with it, would have enabled him to perfect something to present as a substitute for it, so that he and I can join hands in accomplishing the end that he says he has in view and that I certainly have.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me one moment?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. It is my purpose, unless some other Senator anticipates me, to offer eventually as a substitute for this bill the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa who now stands before me.

Mr. MORGAN. I would like to submit to the Senator from Iowa, inasmuch as the proposition is opposed by the Senator from Kansas, that it would be better that the Senator should consent to a recommitment of this bill, so that the committee on Monday may bring in a bill confining the operations of the measure to transportation between the States and Territories, and between foreign countries and this country.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think I shall close in time for the Senator to make any motion he may choose to make in that direction; I prefer to go on.

I must repeat again that I think there are objections to this bill, somewhat serious objections to it. My colleagues upon the committee know that very well; but I do not think that the bill as presented is fairly liable to the criticisms that have been made against it by the Senator from Kansas. He speaks of that section of the bill in which a provision is made whereby under certain conditions the Treasury of the United States may be called upon to pay for cattle slaughtered in the States to prevent the spread of this disease, and he says that provision is made here for paying for animals slaughtered two-thirds of what the value of the animal would be if it were healthy; that an animal may be just on the verge of death by reason of disease, and yet that we are required under this bill to pay two-thirds the value of that animal if it were in a state of sound health. I do not so understand the bill at all. I presume if an animal were slaughtered that was upon the verge of death it would not be paid for at two-thirds the value it would have if in health. The language is not to pay two-thirds the value of the animal in health, but not exceeding two-thirds of the value. It may be that some animals ought to be slaughtered for which it would be fair to pay two-thirds the value if in health. If disease gets among a herd and the animals apparently healthy and those known to be diseased have been running together in such condition and under such circumstances that those apparently in health are liable to contract disease, it may be safer to slaughter all and pay for those that are infected, those that are diseased, in such proportion of the two-thirds of their value if healthy as would be just, and to pay for those in which disease has not yet developed itself at all and which are apparently in full health two-thirds of their value.

Again, as to requiring this payment to be made out of the Treasury of the United States I have this to remark: the disease does not yet, thank God, exist in the West. It does exist in the older and richer States of this Union. We of the West are asking to have means taken to prevent it from spreading among us, and to do that experience has shown that the only way to stamp it out is to slaughter the animals infected and those that have been exposed to infection. Now, it might be and it would be the fair thing for the older States to do to pay for this out of their own treasury; but when we come to the Congress of the United States and say to them, "This measure is necessary for our protection," we are willing to say that the expense incurred in doing it shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, because it is done for our protection as well as for the protection of the States in which it really exists. The Senator from Kansas may not agree with me about that; he may think that New Jersey should slaughter and pay for her own cattle. I would be content if she would; but rather than that the cattle of New Jersey shall threaten the interest of the vast country in which I live, in which so much of the wealth of the people is invested, upon the continuance of which so much depends, I am perfectly willing that money shall be appropriated from the Treasury of the United States to be used for that, as I deem, legitimate purpose. We spend money for a great many purposes here.

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I interrupt the Senator a moment? I think the State of New Jersey has been slandered about enough without some attempt at defense. I wish to say to the honorable Senator that the people of New Jersey want neither sympathy nor charity. We have no diseased animals to send to Iowa or any other State. It is true there is some disease among animals in New Jersey, but it is found in stables where there is a heated and tainted atmosphere; but where the cattle are allowed to roam, as they are in the western country, in the open air, and have pure and wholesome food, there is no difficulty. We have never known a case of disease in New Jersey, except under the conditions I have named; and I believe that it is perfect nonsense to assert that pleuro-pneumonia or any other disease among cattle can be found in the western country, where they have a wide range, with plenty of pure air and plenty of wholesome food. What disease we have in New Jersey—and I admit we have some there, and also in New York—is occasioned by the evils in transportation by which animals are exposed to tortures and privations, brought to market and put in stables in a confined and heated air, and given unwholesome food, swill-slop, and so on.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Jersey if there have been any cases of pleuro-pneumonia in his State that he knows of?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not know what pleuro-pneumonia is.

Mr. PADDOCK. There have been reports as to the existence of that disease in New Jersey and other States.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have in my hand the report——

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should prefer to go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. GARLAND in the chair.) The Senator from Iowa holds the floor and declines to yield further.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should prefer to go on and get through with what I have to say. I have an intense dislike of troubling the Senate with too many remarks on any subject.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I shall certainly not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I hope the Senator from New Jersey is right, both in stating that this disease does not exist in his State and that it is impossible that it shall exist in the Northwest; but I have found so many men equally as intelligent as the Senator from New Jersey who differ with him in opinion that I must be excused if I cannot accept his statement as conclusive.

I have made what remarks I desired to make upon the subject of the payments provided by one of the sections with which so much fault was found, and I do not wish to repeat them. Upon the general question whether it is right for us to take this money out of the Treasury, I repeat the remark I made, that we spend money for a great many purposes perhaps not as entirely legitimate as this might be; certainly not as useful as this will be I hope.

Mr. JOHNSTON. We paid for the ravages of the grasshoppers in Kansas and Nebraska.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. We shall be called upon by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] the chairman of the Committee on the Library, some time before we adjourn, to pass a bill that involves the expenditure eventually, I suppose, of not less than $5,000,000, to put up an immense library building here in our city in which all books upon all subjects shall be gathered, in which we shall find room for all the yellow-covered literature of the day, everything copyrighted, things that in themselves, many of them, are a nuisance. The only imaginable use for them that I can conceive is that they shall be preserved for a hundred or two hundred years so that the curious antiquary of that remote day in looking back and inquiring about the people of this day will have the means of knowing what mental pabulum they fed on to some extent. All that kind of literature, so far as it is necessary to preserve it, had better be boxed up and placed away, I think, until the time shall come when it will be needed for the use I have indicated. A library for good books that contain useful knowledge is one thing; a library to gather together all the trash that is published of every kind that has value enough in the eyes of the writer to be copyrighted is a somewhat different thing.

The remarks of the Senator from Kansas with reference to section 5 of the bill have been, I think, already well answered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] A man less astute than the Senator from Kansas I think would not have discovered in this section the meaning that Senator has placed upon it. What was it that this simple-minded committee had in view when they incorporated the fifth section in the bill? Vessels arrive from abroad bringing cattle here. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] himself may have sent to England for the purpose of getting high-bred cattle there to improve his fine herd; and yet it may be that this disease still lingers in England, and it may be that those cattle, coming over from there here and brought to Kentucky, may introduce by that means the disease among his herd, which I should so much regret. Now, what do we provide? We provide that rules and regulations shall be established under which, in accordance with the provisions of this act, cattle from abroad may be brought here, or by which cattle may be taken from one State to another. If, when cattle come from abroad here, they are found to be thoroughly diseased, it will be lawful under this act for the proper officers to cause their slaughter. If they are suspected of disease, it will be lawful to have them confined and quarantined until time shall develop whether they have that disease. It certainly did not enter into the contemplation of any members of the committee that, in providing this section of the bill, they provided for the importation of diseased cattle.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to ask a question for information.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I yield.

Mr. MAXEY. As I understand, all the bills referred to the Select Committee had reference exclusively to pleuro-pneumonia among cattle, which is a foreign disease imported to this country. Why was it that the bill was changed from one applying exclusively to horned cattle and to the specific disease of pleuro-pneumonia, so as to sweep in all live stock and every kind of disease?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator is mistaken about that. My bill embraced all.

Mr. MAXEY. Under laws in most of the States, I presume under the laws of the Senator's State, whose diseased cattle have been slaughtered, if they remain unburied or unburned those who are at fault are liable to indictment in the State courts for leaving the carcasses exposed. Under the bill hundreds and thousands of cattle may be diseased, and slaughtered, but no provision whatever is made for disposing of the carcasses, and if not disposed of they would defile the air and create a great many more diseases than the bill seeks to extirpate.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The question asked by the Senator from Texas is based upon a mistaken state of the facts. All the bills referred to the special committee were not confined to the single disease of pleuro-pneumonia.

Mr. MAXEY. I said I asked the question for information. I know the impression in the country has been that the measures presented related to pleuro-pneumonia only.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The information of the Senator from Texas has not been correct in regard to that matter. In regard to the other statement, it is intended by the bill that these commissioners shall have the power to prevent the very condition of things that the Senator from Texas says may exist. The mere slaughtering of the cattle and leaving them above the ground is not required by this bill. The commissioners appointed under the bill are not restricted to the mere slaughtering of them, and thereby inferring a requirement that they shall be left above ground. This is not the extent of their authority.

Mr. MAXEY. It is the extent of the duty imposed upon them.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. They will have authority to do the very things the Senator from Texas says should be done; and I presume as sensible men they will exercise the authority.

Mr. MAXEY. I do not pretend that they could not do it; but the bill only requires them to slaughter the cattle; it does not require them to dispose of the carcasses.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. No; it does not. When a beef is slaughtered by the butcher nobody is required to eat it; but the natural end for which the animal is slaughtered in the one case is to be eaten, and the natural end for which the animal is slaughtered in the other case is to prevent it from becoming a nuisance. It is to be presumed, I think, that any set of men who will be charged with that duty would see that that end was accomplished.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield to me a moment?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I shall not be five minutes in concluding if I can be only allowed to proceed without further interruption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I endeavored in the opening of my remarks to show to the Senate what I conceived to be the very great importance of passing some bill that will effect the two objects I have named as the purpose to be accomplished by the bill. One is to aid so far as we can in removing the embarrassment and restriction under which our cattle are now exported to Great Britain. I said, and say again, that it is becoming of so much importance that to-day it swells by millions that balance of trade in our favor upon which so much depends. If we can encourage it by any legislation that will take out of the way of that industry for the future that which now embarrasses it and makes it of great risk and frequently a matter of loss to the men who engage in it, we shall be doing a good thing; we shall be strengthening the credit of the United States; we shall be aiding and making possible, as I before said, the placing of bonds bearing 3 per cent. interest not probable but possible. We shall be aiding in making it both possible and probable that we shall have the money to pay the interest upon those bonds and the principal of others that will fall due before them.

So with the other object this bill is designed to accomplish, the prevention of the spread of this disease into Ohio, into Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and the great West beyond them where cattle are now herded by thousands and tens of thousands, adding to the wealth of the country.

I appeal to Senators, do not approach this bill in the spirit of criticism merely. If you believe these objects are worthy of accomplishment, come forward and aid in perfecting a bill that will secure them. Do not spend your ingenuity, do not spend your ability, do not spend your strength in carping and fault-finding with what others have attempted to do, but show something better in lieu of it; and when you shall have done so, for one, and I think I can speak for this committee as well, there will be no man here who will join more heartily or more cheerfully in aiding the passage of any bill which will accomplish those objects.

I apologize to the Senate for having delayed it so long.

Mr. MORGAN. I am satisfied that one feature of this bill is very important and is probably clearly within the powers of Congress under the Constitution, and that is to prevent the transportation of diseased animals between States and Territories and to and from the United States and foreign countries. I am equally satisfied that there is no other part of the bill that is within the powers of Congress under the Constitution. The resolution under which the bill was sent to the committee, as I understand it, was a resolution to report a bill confining the subject of the reported bill to the purpose of preventing the transportation of animals affected with pleuropneumonia. That is as far as I think the Senate authorized the committee to go in perfecting a bill.

With a view of having some progress made in this question which will enable us on Monday to pass a proper bill, I move that this bill be recommitted to the committee with instructions to report back a bill to the Senate for the purpose of regulating the transportation of cattle among the several States and Territories and to and from the United States and foreign countries that are affected with pleuropneumonia.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would be the end of the bill for this session.

Mr. MORGAN. No; I will say to the honorable Senator we can take the bill up on Monday and pass it. If the Senate will not do that, and if the committee desire to defeat the proposition, it cannot do it any better than by undertaking to press the present measure upon the attention of the Senate, for it includes several propositions that many Senators, I am sure, regard as being entirely beyond the powers of Congress, and some of us think that the machinery of the bill is very unfortunate.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to state to the Senator from Alabama that there is now a bill in the Committee on Commerce which was introduced by me nearly two years ago, which has been considered by the Senate, regulating the transportation of animals. In my opinion, and I believe I can make it appear to the Senate, the mode of transportation is the cause of nine-tenths of the diseases that to-day afflict herds of cattle. If the Committee on Commerce would report that bill, or, acting in concert with the special committee, attach amendments covering certain points designed to be reached in the pending bill, it would make a perfect and complete measure under which effective action could be had.

Mr. MORGAN. I take it for granted that the special committee can report as good a bill as any other committee, perhaps; and as we have the subject in hand and it is now in consideration by the Senate it will be a very easy matter for that committee on Monday to report an amendment or substitute to this bill. Then we can take it up for consideration on Monday, and I believe that this very important measure can be passed during the present session of Congress. I ignore the importance of this question by no means; it is one that presses heavily upon public attention; but in the present attitude of the case we are not going to get this bill through the Senate in time at least for it to be acted upon by the House, and I cannot conceal the fact that there are objections to the bill entirely insuperable. The committee have unfortunately brought together various propositions which are incongruous, as the Senator from Kansas well observed. They have brought together certain features which we have a constitutional right to enact, and certain others which we have not a right to enact. It is an attempt to ingraft upon the power to regulate commerce a good many other things which are entirely foreign to it, and which invade the rights of the States and of the people.

Therefore I think the bill ought to be recommitted to the committee with a view to these considerations and they can bring in a bill for the transportation of animals with reference to the disease of pleuropneumonia. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama to recommit the bill, with the instructions suggested by him.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I can say for one member of the committee that our object is not to get a particular bill passed, but to get some bill passed; if we cannot get the bill we want, then to get some other measure through. I am perfectly willing, and, so far as I know, it is the sentiment of the committee, to take any bill that will be effective and operative. However, I suggest to the Senator from Alabama and to the Senate that any measure for regulating the transportation and exportation of cattle must be incomplete unless it is coupled with some sort of a measure for the extirpation of the disease. As long as the disease exists in the country here we can never make any regulation for the transportation of cattle that will be satisfactory.

Let me read on this subject, to show what the English Government thinks, a letter from Mr. Peel, the clerk of the privy council, to the under secretary of State, a very high and responsible authority, dated February 27, 1879:

> In reply I am directed to state, for the information of Lord Salisbury, that the lords of the council have carefully considered the orders given by the American Government for the inspection of cattle previous to exportation. Their lordships are, however, aware from their own experience that no system of inspection at the port, however perfect, affords complete security against the introduction of pleuropneumonia. So long, therefore, as that disease exists in the United States, their lordships regret that, looking to the provisions of the contagious diseases animals act, 1878, relative to importation of foreign animals, they are unable to modify the order of the 10th of February, 1879, which prohibits the introduction into Great Britain, except for slaughter, of cattle from the United States of America.

Mr. MORGAN. If the honorable Senator will indulge me one second, I will say to him that I grant fully the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States and Territories so as to prevent the transportation of cattle that are diseased; but I do not and cannot admit the power of Congress to extirpate the disease in States by slaughtering animals and paying for them, or by any other means. So we differ upon the constitutional question.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It is quite certain that any measure which falls short of extirpating the disease in the United States will not attain what we desire. As long as we fail to pass a law of Congress for that purpose, so long will these restrictions which are imposed in our principal market exist.

Mr. McPHERSON. Why will it not attain it?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have read a letter from the British privy council office stating the fact.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have here the evidence by a commission of the State of New Jersey, appointed by the governor of New Jersey under an act passed by the Legislature, which shows that every diseased animal during the year 1879 was slaughtered or placed in quarantine. What is there to prevent the people of every State in this Union from taking the same action with respect to their diseased animals that the State of New Jersey has done, according to its own report?

Mr. JOHNSTON. We know very well that Great Britain and all foreign nations that deal with the United States do not recognize any action by a State any more than this Government would recognize the action of Yorkshire or Berkshire or Shropshire or any other county in England. They look upon the States here as we do upon the counties there; and whenever we stop short of congressional action we shall not succeed. If we are to have any measure at all to be effective, it must be one passed by Congress. If the subject is important enough to require these restrictions upon trade there, affecting this great trade with Great Britain especially, we must do it through Congress by some act passed.

Mr. ROLLINS. What is the pending question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN,] to recommit the bill with the instructions which he indicated.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to say just one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia still has the floor.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON. For a suggestion.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to say that I do not think it worth while to recommit this bill to the committee. There is no good that can be accomplished, in my judgment, by any such course of proceeding. The bill was considered diligently by the committee, of which I happened to be a member; and there was as radical a difference of opinion in the committee as has been exhibited here in the Senate. I believe that the only place to fight this out is here upon the floor of the Senate, and it is of no use to recommit the bill.

If the Senate will examine the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Iowa and the bill which was submitted by me, Senate bill No. 1893, they will find that the bill (Senate bill No. 1893) is simply designed to protect the transportation of animals. It is a very simple bill and embodies very much the idea suggested by the Senator from Alabama in his motion to recommit with instructions. I call his attention to that bill. If any members of the Senate desire to embrace more than is contained in that bill it will be found in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. PADDOCK. Is there anything in the bill of the Senator from New Hampshire or the amendment of the Senator from Iowa that authorizes the stamping out of the disease where it shall be discovered by slaughter?

Mr. ROLLINS. There is in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. I would say before I sit down, and I am reminded that the time is rapidly approaching when the Senate is to adjourn, that the bill reported by the committee did not meet with my approbation. I think some measure of this kind is absolutely necessary, but I should be glad to support a different bill.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. It is impossible to have anything done at this session if the bill be recommitted again to the committee. They cannot report before Monday; the bill would have to be printed; a single objection would carry it over; appropriation bills are coming; and we must wrestle with what we have before us. We have the Rollins bill, the Williams bill, the bill submitted by myself, and the bill from the committee all before us, and we might, I think, take some one of them and propose it as a substitute to the pending bill, and try to get something done if the Senate desire to do anything. It will be impossible to have the action taken that the Senator from Alabama suggests. For myself, I cannot be with the committee on Monday next.

Mr. MORGAN. If the honorable Senator will allow me——

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have said all I have to say. The matter is in charge of the Senate, and it must do as it deems best.

Mr. MORGAN. I will withdraw my motion, upon the understanding that the committee are satisfied with the suggestion, that on Monday they will report a substitute for this bill of the character which I have indicated, so that the bill will come up as the unfinished business and may not be displaced.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The bill will be the unfinished business anyway. We are to adjourn at two o'clock.

Mr. ROLLINS. I desire to give notice that unless some other bill is prepared by the committee and offered, I shall move Senate bill No. 1893 as a substitute for the bill now under consideration.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw my motion to recommit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama withdraws the motion to recommit with instructions; and the question now is upon the amendment to section 2, offered by the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] and upon that he has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSTON. We have to adjourn, I understand, at two o'clock, and I am too limited as to time to say anything except to state that I shall endeavor to get a meeting of the committee and see if we cannot agree to something that will be acceptable to the Senate, and report it on Monday morning if we can.

Mr. INGALLS. Is the question on my amendment to the second section?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, which precedes the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas. The hour of two o'clock having arrived, under the resolution adopted a few minutes since the Senate stands adjourned until Monday next at eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 19, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ELIZABETH DAVIS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 4852) granting a pension to Elizabeth Davis; and that the bill be now taken up, and passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Davis, widow of Hannibal B. Davis, late captain of Company K, Fourth Regiment Missouri State Militia, to date from death of said Hannibal B. Davis.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be now passed. The Chair is advised that it has been considered by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who have unanimously reported in favor of its passage.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HERBERT JOYCE.

Mr. PRESCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5748) for the relief of Herbert Joyce, and that the bill be now put on its passage. It has been considered by the Committee on Claims, who in a unanimous report have recommended its passage. The report can be read if any gentleman desires it.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department of the United States are hereby directed to settle with and, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, pay to Herbert Joyce, late a private of Company B, Second Battalion Sixteenth United States Infantry, all bounty, pay, and allowances retained from him by reason of a sentence of a court-martial, approved April 23, 1866, remitted August 15, 1866, he having subsequently served for the full term of his original enlistment of five years, and has been honorably discharged.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SURETIES OF HENRY L. NORVELL.

Mr. HOUSE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 1004) for the relief of the sureties of Henry L. Norvell, and that it be now put on its passage.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Andrew Hamilton and R. B. Castleman, and the heirs and personal representatives of James Woods, William R. Elliston, and M. G. L. Claiborne, be, and the same are hereby, released and discharged from any and all liability or payment of money upon a bond executed in the year 1864 by Henry L. Norvell as principal, and James Woods, William R. Elliston, M. G. L. Claiborne, Andrew Hamilton, and R. B. Castleman as sureties, conditioned as required by law for the performance, by said Norvell, of the duties of the office of revenue collector for the second district of Tennessee, and also are released from the payment of any judgment that may have been rendered upon said bond.

Mr. HOUSE. This bill has been passed by the Senate; the Committee on Ways and Means of this House has unanimously recommended its passage, which is also recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. There is no objection to it anywhere.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOUSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SURETIES OF FRANKLIN TRAVIS.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent to have taken up for passage at this time a bill now on the Private Calendar, House bill No. 688, for the relief of the sureties of Franklin Travis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas, on the 9th day of May, 1867, Joseph W. McCall, Young W. Allen, Wilburn H. Graves, Eli T. McGill, Priestley E. Parker, Henry McCall, and Jasper Ballew became the sureties of Franklin Travis, on his bond, executed on that day, as deputy collector of taxes, under an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government," and so forth; and

Whereas said bond was conditioned that the said Travis would execute and discharge the duties of deputy collector according to law, and the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the act of March 1, 1865, was the law when the bond was executed; and

Whereas, by the law at the time said sureties executed said bond, they could only be liable for the amount of certain lists returned by assessors appointed for that purpose, and under the provisions of the act of July 13, 1866, with two months' supply of stamps denoting the tax on fermented liquors; and

Whereas, by an act of Congress approved July 20, 1868, the said collector was required to keep constantly on hand a large amount of stamps, and by said act his pay was changed, and the collector converted from a simple collector of assessed taxes into a public depositary of the public funds and valuables, the property of the United States, and the manner of collecting and paying over changed without the consent of the sureties, and the sureties deprived of the opportunity of knowing the amount for which they were liable, he being charged with the amount of stamps deposited with him, and the risk of the sureties greatly increased without their consent; and

Whereas the said Franklin Travis fully and faithfully kept and performed all the conditions of his said bond, executed on the 9th day of May, 1867, until after the passage of the act of July 20, 1868, and then made default to about the amount of twenty-nine thousand dollars, which liability was incurred on account of stamps which could not have come into his hands under any law existing at the time said bond was executed; and it would be contrary to the principles of justice that the sureties should be held liable for the amount of said default: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That Joseph W. McCall, Young W. Allen, Wilburn H. Graves, Eli T. McGill, Priestley E. Parker, Henry McCall, and Jasper Ballew be, and they are hereby, released from all liability as sureties of the said Franklin Travis as collector of internal revenue, whether the said liability may have been fixed by judgment or be upon said bond executed by them on the 9th day of May, 1867.

Mr. ATKINS. If the House will indulge me a moment I will state that this bill has been unanimously recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means of this House.

Mr. MILLS. What are the facts?

Mr. ATKINS. The facts are simply these: the parties whom this bill proposes to relieve are sureties on the bond of a deputy collector of internal revenue. The bond was signed in 1867. By an act which became a law July 20, 1868, the responsibility of the collector was changed without the consent of the sureties, who thus became liable for certain stamps for which they could not have become liable under the law as it existed when they executed their bond.

Mr. WARNER. Is there a unanimous report?

Mr. ATKINS. The report from the Committee on Ways and Means is unanimous.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WEAVER.]

Mr. DUNN. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour will now begin and reports from committees be received

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON. Have I the right to give notice that I will on a certain day call up for consideration the Senate bill I hold in my hand, providing for a convention between this country and Nicaragua?

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to state that in his recognitions this morning he recognized two members on one side and two on the other and then went to the center of the House.

Mr. WILSON. Have I not a right to give such notice?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether the bill is privileged or not.

Mr. WILSON. It is to provide for a convention between this country and Nicaragua.

The SPEAKER. That is not a privileged report, so far as the Chair can see.

Mr. WILSON. I will give notice now, then, that on Tuesday morning I will try to call it up and put it on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded. It is the right of any member to demand the regular order of business; and, having been demanded, it will now be proceeded with.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I move to dispense with the morning hour to-day.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. No; I make the motion and demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 64.

So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the motion to dispense with the morning hour was disagreed to.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at eleven o'clock and thirty minutes, and reports are now in order.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] desires to rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. COX. If in order I call up the unfinished business coming over.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I read yesterday a copy of the Courier-Journal, a paper published in my State and which circulates through my district, with an article marked, containing what purports to be the remarks of a Representative from Texas (Mr. REAGAN, chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who reported the river and harbor bill to this House) to the correspondent of that paper, C. E. M., in which he singles me out of the eighty-six members who voted against the river and harbor bill when he attempted to pass it under a suspension of the rules, and failed, reflecting upon my action in an unkind, ungenerous, and unjust manner, attributing to me insincere motives in my vote against that bill and a want of patriotism. I would not notice it at all if it did not purport to come from one for whom I have always had the highest esteem and regard since I have been a member of this House, and with whom I have acted in unison in all his efforts to pass his interstate-commerce bill to protect the people from these railroad monopolies, but with whom I was compelled to differ in regard to the river and harbor bill, and against which I voted.

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to be placed in a false position upon that question. Now, what are the facts? At the last session the gentleman reported the river and harbor bill having in it several hundred items of appropriations, many of them to harbors and streams comparatively unknown and insignificant. He moved to suspend the rules and pass it, and under the rules of this House no amendment could be offered and only fifteen minutes given to those opposed to it to offer an objection. The bill appropriated over eight millions of dollars. I regarded the bill, to say the least of it, a very extravagant and injudicious one. It made but small appropriations to the Mississippi, the Ohio, Cumberland, and Tennessee, all large, navigable streams for hundreds of miles.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that this is going beyond the question of personal privilege. There is nothing, so far as the gentleman has stated, which indicates that this is a question of a personal character.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this is hardly a personal explanation, but rather partakes of the nature of an argument.

Mr. CONGER. It is plain that so far, at all events, the gentleman has made simply an argument.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. If the gentleman will keep his seat for a moment and listen he will see that I am not going outside of the rules of this House or of the question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed under the rule.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Much of the balance was to small streams of an insignificant character, of which I and many in this House had never heard. I therefore felt it my duty to vote against it, and did so with forty-eight others, there were not voting sixty-five. It went to the Senate, and while it was under consideration Mr. JAMES BECK, one of our Senators from Kentucky, whose long experience in this House and as a member of the Senate entitle his opinions to much respect, at least in Kentucky, gave his opinion of that bill to the Senate in the following words in a speech made in the Senate June 1, 1880, to be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 43, page 4016, second session of Forty-sixth Congress, as follows:

Mr. President, the democratic party pretended—perhaps that is a better word than proclaimed—when it came into power that it was going to relieve the country from taxation. It has done very little in that regard. It professed that it was going to be reasonably economical in the expenditures. It has endeavored to keep its word in that regard; but this bill is to-day the most extravagant of the bills that ever were sought to be passed by any Congress so far as I recollect.

If we are to be a failure in reducing taxation, and we are going to increase expenditures, then of course we enter the next canvass very well loaded. It is well to speak plainly, because the country understands it. I read the New York papers of to-day and yesterday, in which they are now asserting with great emphasis and with some truth that we are more extravagant in our expenditures than any Congress has been before. The Secretary of the Treasury has taken extreme pains in all his reports to beg us to keep within the estimates; and if we go beyond them it will not be his fault, because he has warned us over and over and over again that we could very well keep within them and yet have enough for all purposes.

What are the estimates for the rivers and harbors for this country? Five million and fifteen thousand dollars as submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury. Now we have made the appropriation in this bill between nine and ten millions of dollars. Here is what the Secretary says; I hold the book in my hand, and that is the reason why I have been making several suggestions to-day. After giving the list of what the engineers have said ought to be done, the whole amount of which was $14,326,650, the Secretary adds this note:

"Reduction by Secretary of War to make this aggregate correspond with the aggregate of his estimates for rivers and harbors, as submitted December, 1878. (Estimate Book for 1878-'80, p. 138.) $9,311,650; total harbors and rivers, $5,015,000."

That is what the Secretary of the Treasury asks for; that is what he says the Secretary of War demands; and yet a professed democratic Congress presents a bill now close on to $10,000,000, double the estimates of a republican Secretary of the Treasury, of a republican Secretary of War, and seeks to put every dollar of this money into the hands of republican electioneerers to carry the next election, and there is where half the money will go. I have endeavored as far as I could to keep within the estimates. I have endeavored to keep clear of a proper charge being made that we were extravagant beyond what the heads of Departments demanded.

Savannah is a great city; and I will say to the Senator from Georgia that when his State had no representative here and I was at the other end of the Capitol, I labored until we had all the appropriations that we could possibly get to clear out all the obstructions from the harbor of Savannah, and do whatever we could for her, and to-day I say she is one of the great harbors that ought to be cared for. The difficulty is that every saw-log stream, every creek in everybody's district has been forced upon this committee until they have been unable to hold up. The Committee on Commerce has endeavored to do all that it could, and I have been amazed at the Senator from North Carolina that he has been able to do as much as he has done in holding this bill down to where it is in the pressure made upon it.

I refer to his views to show from the opinion and facts stated by him—and he is an old and experienced member—that so far from the criticism purporting to have been passed upon me by the honorable gentleman from Texas being just, that I did right in voting against that bill, and that it was not "parsimonious," but patriotic to do so, and it would have been a good thing for the country and the tax-payers if that bill had been defeated so far as any material benefit to commerce is concerned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how is it with the present river and harbor bill? It is a bill containing several hundred items of appropriations, amounting to $10,179,800—$2,000,000 more than the last bill. The bill is a little better in some respects than the one passed last session, and much worse in others. I regarded it as extravagant and unwise, and a monstrosity. The gentleman from Texas would not let the bill go upon the Calendar and be submitted to the Committee of the Whole House to be investigated and amended, but moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill in the same way he had the last bill, allowing no amendment, and only fifteen minutes for debate to those of us who did not approve of the bill as it was. I felt it my duty to those whom I have the honor to represent on this floor to vote against it, and I did so. I was not alone. Who else voted against it? Let the record speak.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the motion of Mr. REAGAR to suspend the rules was not agreed to.

Many of those not voting were paired against the bill, among the number Mr. CARLISLE and Mr. CALDWELL of Kentucky. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 8th, 44th page.) Mr. KNOTT was opposed to the bill and voted against it after it had passed the Committee of the Whole House, February 17th. Now, sir, it will be seen that Hon. J. S. BLACKBURN, Mr. CALDWELL, Mr. CARLISLE, and Mr. KNOTT, all members from my State, did not vote for the bill under the suspension of the rules. They are all older members than myself—have seen more of these bills—and for that reason I refer to their action, and because we represent a common interest. But, sir, I care nothing about that, for I should have voted against it alone in the discharge of a duty to those who elected me.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kentucky is arguing the propriety of passing the river and harbor bill.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I will confine myself to the question of personal privilege, as the Chair will find in a moment.

Mr. HATCH. I insist upon the point of order that the gentleman is going beyond the question of privilege.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is an abuse of the personal privilege.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. If gentlemen will wait for a moment they will see that it is a direct attack upon my vote upon this bill; which I have a right to answer and defend.

Mr. HATCH. I insist upon my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that as the attack, in addition to what has already been said by way of objections of gentlemen to the present mode of proceeding, was not made in the House that the gentleman should confine himself strictly to the point of order.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. It is a direct attack upon my action as a Representative of this House, and I have the right to vindicate myself. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. Speaker, why is it that I am singled out of this list of eighty-six to be criticised by the gentleman from Texas in this unjust way reported? I have never been opposed to the improvement of the Mississippi, Ohio, Tennessee, Cumberland, and other great navigable rivers, and would vote as much to the improvement of their navigation as the gentleman from Texas. I believe, sir, it is economy to cheapen and improve water navigation of a national character for the benefit of commerce, and especially to benefit the farmers of the country in the transporting the fruits of their labor to market. Cheap water navigation is the most powerful aid to break down railroad monopolies that are crushing the agriculturists of the country. But, sir, I cannot afford to vote millions of dollars to small local streams and creeks that in all probability will never be remunerative, for the sake of getting a pittance for the mighty rivers that flow around and through my district.

Mr. Speaker, the district that I have the honor to represent fronts one hundred and seventy-five miles on the Ohio and Mississippi, and, sir, under the provisions of this bill not one dollar is to be expended within the limits of my district, nor do I believe the people I represent will derive a single dollar of benefit from it. Why, sir, directly in front of my district, just above the mouth of the Ohio, lies a ledge of rocks in the river known as the Grand Chain. It cuts off in low-water the communication except for very small boats between the mouth of the Cumberland and the Tennessee and between Paducah, a fine commercial city in my district, and the Mississippi River; besides this it is a barrier that locks up the river commerce of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and all Tennessee that lies upon the Tennessee rivers, for six months in the year. Each one of these States pays into the Treasury annually in internal revenue alone more than all the New England States together.

In 1878 the State of Kentucky paid into the United States Treasury over six millions of dollars in internal revenue alone. The district, part of which I represent, paid into the Treasury over one million.

Since 1863 Kentucky has paid into the United States Treasury the sum of $109,000,000; Illinois, $230,000,000; Indiana, $80,000,000; Ohio, $250,000,000, in internal revenue alone, and yet, Mr. Speaker, there stands that barrier locking up the river commerce of these greas States, and not one dollar out of the ten millions appropriated by thit bill to remove it. Sir, if it was in front of some small lake or ocean harbors it would be blowed out in twelve months if it cost a million of dollars to do it, and it would have been done long ago.

Mr. REED. I rise to a question of order. Does the Chair decide that is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Kentucky has gone beyond the rule applicable to questions of personal privilege, and is rather making an argument on the river and harbor bill than addressing himself to the matter of personal privilege.

Mr. REED. There are other gentlemen who might wish an opportunity, if it were allowed, to give their views on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that when a question of order is raised the gentleman speaking against whom it is made must take his seat.

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I claim that I have the right which every other gentleman has on this floor to vindicate myself when attacked in my capacity as a member of Congress; and I know the gentleman from Texas with his magnanimity would not prevent it. I have said nothing and done nothing to reflect on that gentleman. I have the greatest respect for him. I will conclude what I have to say in two or three minutes more. The whole amount appropriated to the Ohio River in the bill was $350,000; and $150,000 of that to be expended on a dam near Pittsburgh, leaving only the small balance to be scattered along over eight hundred miles, without any just system whatever.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Kentucky is unnecessarily sensitive. I never heard him accused of voting for a bill appropriating money for any purpose, either the necessary expenses of the Government or any other, except one, and that was for a public building in his district.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. The gentleman from West Virginia, who is a member of the Committee on Commerce that framed the river and harbor bill, need not be so sensitive; he has gotten through his appropriations in that bill for West Virginia, and he ought to be satisfied; he got an appropriation for public buildings last session, and I am not referring to him. His insinuation is not correct in regard to my votes; I have voted for all necessary appropriation bills that were not extravagant, and against those that I thought were so.

Mr. KENNA. I hope my remark was heard by the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear it in the confusion, but probably the reporters heard it. The point of order is made that the gentleman from Kentucky is not confining himself to the personal explanation.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I will show to the House and to the Speaker that I am. [Applause and laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to have the gentleman do so.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I do not speak without knowing what I am talking about. There has been an imputation made upon me. Here is the language of the gentleman from Texas, as reported in the Courier-Journal:

> There is OSCAR TURNER, for one, who is allowed for the rivers running through and sweeping around his district about two millions of dollars, and yet he votes a gainst the bill, though I have no doubt he would be very happy indeed to see it pass without his vote. He wants to get the credit of being economical, and his only idea of patriotism seems to be parsimony.

Have I not the right to vindicate myself from a charge and accusation of that kind?

Mr. CONGER. That is a proper question to be submitted to the House.

Mr. REED. I insist on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine insists on the point of order.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I shall confine myself within the rules.

Many MEMBERS. Go on! Go on!

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Sir, does any fair-minded man expect me to vote for a bill so unjust to my constituents and State that fronts eight hundred miles on the Ohio River? And, sir, is it just for the gentleman to charge me with parsimony, because I will not vote for such a bill? I think not; and, sir, I am not to be bulldozed, to use the language of the gentleman from Tennessee the other day, by any such unjust criticisms as are reported to have come from the gentleman, and which have gone over my district and State. Sir, since I voted against the last river and harbor bill I have been re-elected to a seat on this floor, and my vote against the river and harbor bill at last session was lugged into the canvass, and I met the issue and justified my vote against the bill at last session and was re-elected by a majority of over eight thousand over my democratic opponent and over five thousand over my republican oponent, and not, sir, through the agency of a convention, [great applause,] but by the free choice of the people of my district, a district that I am proud of. It has always been democratic, and is known from this fact as the Gibraltar of Kentucky; and, sir, as long as I have the honor to represent it I mean to bear aloft its standard and vote in accordance with what I believe to be the true doctrines of democracy. [Great applause.]

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, permit me to say I do not impugn and I have not, either on this floor or off of it, impugned the motives of the gentleman from Texas in his vote on this or any other bill. I have always regarded him as an able legislator. He secured by this bill $750,000 for his own State, and no doubt feels justified in voting for it, and in reporting the bill it is a question for him and his constituents and none of mine to criticise his vote or action; and, sir, I claim the same right. I came here pledged to carry out retrenchment and reform, and as far as my votes and humble ability will permit I shall redeem the pledge to the people of my district. [Applause.]

Mr. REAGAN rose.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. One more word.

Mr. VALENTINE. I rise to a question of order. I do not care how long the gentleman from Kentucky speaks, but I would like to hear what he says.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Sir, so far as his reference to parsimony is concerned I admire liberality, but liberality with a man's own money, and not with that that is wrung from the toiling masses of the country by an unjust system of taxation; and I do not think that voting for extravagant and useless appropriations is an elevated standard of patriotism. [Laughter and applause.] And as for his belief that I desired the passage of this bill, it is without the least foundation, for it is well known that I opposed this bill from the day it was reported, and voted against it when he attempted to pass it under suspension of the rules, and voted against it when put upon its passage the second time, as the record will show.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, I have never avoided responsibility since I have been a member of this Congress. I have attended every session and voted upon every question, except the final passage of the funding bill, as the record will show; and I voted for every amendment to the original bill reported by Mr. Wood that was reported by the Committee of the Whole House, and many in the committee. I voted for the shortest time and the lowest interest. I could not vote for the bill on its final passage, because I was opposed to funding the debt, for reasons I assigned on this floor, although it was greatly improved by our amendments, and I could not vote against it with the long-time and high-interest men who opposed every amendment and finally voted against the bill, without placing myself in a false attitude, so I did not vote at all; and it is the only instance in which I did not vote, and my vote would not have changed the result either way. I thank the Speaker and the House for the indulgence extended to me.

Mr. REAGAN. I can hardly say what I may have said in relation to this bill. I do not know how what I did say on any occasion got into the newspapers, for I certainly never was interviewed if what has been read purports to be an interview. I never was spoken to by anybody who wished my opinions to go into print. I know that while the contest was going on over the river and harbor bill I said to several friends around me—I do not know it has that reference—to men representing the Northwestern States, and speaking to friends who took no exception to what I said, that conventions had been held year after year where delegates from all along the Mississippi River, from Minnesota, Iowa, and Wisconsin, from Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee, from Arkansas, from Mississippi, had passed resolutions asking the Government to engage in the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River. I did say to friends here, personal and political friends, who were voting against the bill on the floor, without meaning offense and without giving offense, that it was strange, after all the efforts made by the people of that valley to secure appropriations for the Mississippi River, they should be voting against the bill. I did not attempt or intend to impugn their motives. I had reference to that single question, and it may have been some such remark that is here referred to. I may have said, for I know I thought it, that the district of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] was the recipient of the benefits of an appropriation of $350,000 for the improvement of the Ohio River; that it was the recipient of benefits for the improvement of the Cumberland and the Tennessee Rivers which run through that district; that it was the recipient of the benefits of an appropriation of $1,000,000 for the improvement of the Mississippi River below Cairo, lying along one part of his district; and that it was to a large extent the recipient of the benefits that would flow from the $600,000 appropriated for improvements between the mouths of the Ohio and Illinois Rivers. And I expressed my surprise that after the struggle which had been made year after year to secure the improvement of that river, gentlemen so much interested in it should oppose the bill.

And certainly it never was in my mind to impugn the motives of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. OSCAR TURNER] or to deny or question his right to exercise his own judgment in regard to the bill. Nor was it ever in my mind to impugn the motives of any gentleman who felt that his duty required him to vote against the bill.

Mr. CONGER. After this friendly interchange of courtesies in the House, I think we can rest assured that there will be no collision elsewhere, [laughter,] and I make a point of order against a continuation of this debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 301) for the relief of William R. Wilmer; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 178) authorizing certain books and mementoes in the possession of the Government to be placed in Memorial Hall of the National Lincoln Monument, at Springfield, Illinois.

FUNERAL OF HON. FERNANDO WOOD.

Mr. TUCKER submitted the following resolutions; which were read, considered, and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to the memory of Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, late a Representative from the State of New York, and in order to permit the members and officers of this House to attend his funeral from his late residence in this city at three o'clock p. m. this day, at two o'clock p. m. this House will adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolution to the Senate, with an invitation to the members of the Senate to join the members of the House in attending said funeral.

UNITED STATES TENTS FOR INAUGURATION CEREMONIES.

Mr. MCGOWAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 404) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan tents to the committee on inaugural ceremonies on March 4, 1881; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes the Secretary of War to loan to the committee on inaugural ceremonies the tents in the Government depots to be used by the troops and military companies visiting Washington on the 4th day of March next, provided the committee shall indemnify the Government against any loss or damage resulting from the use of said tents.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COX. I expected to call up the apportionment bill at twelve o'clock to-day. Republican members on the other side of the House have advised me that at their conference held last night they did not arrive at a definite conclusion on the matter, but that by Tuesday next they would perhaps do so. I have urged this bill in season and out of season. I think it would be proper, perhaps, to defer still further to the republican members of this House.

Mr. KEIFER. What does the gentleman want?

Mr. COX. I expect to call up the bill the moment I have something definite from the other side; perhaps on Tuesday next. My friend from New York [Mr. COVERT] who has charge of the agricultural appropriation bill is ready to go on with it to-day.

Mr. CONGER. That would be satisfactory to our side of the House.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask consent of the House that an evening session be held on Monday next for the consideration of District of Columbia business.

The SPEAKER. Monday next will be suspension day; the gentleman could ask for Tuesday evening.

Mr. HUNTON. Tuesday is the 22d of February, and there probably will be no session that evening.

The SPEAKER. There will probably be a day session on Tuesday; the necessities of the session may require it.

Mr. HUNTON. I only want Monday evening.

The SPEAKER. Monday is suspension day for committees.

Mr. HUNTON. How would that interfere with an evening session on that day?

The SPEAKER. There might be a disposition on the part of the House, which should not be interfered with, to take a recess on Monday afternoon for the purpose of having an evening session, in order that all the committees, or as many as possible, might be called for motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. HUNTON. But if I get consent now that the evening session of Monday be set aside for the District of Columbia business——

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. HUNTON. If there is any objection then I will ask for some other evening.

Mr. STEVENSON. While I do not desire to antagonize the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] I think it would be well that all the committees which have not been called may be called on Monday next for motions to suspend the rules. I will not object to the gentleman having any other evening which he may suggest, and I do not think the House will object.

Mr. HUNTON. Then I will ask that a recess be taken from five o'clock p. m. until seven and a half o'clock p. m. on Tuesday next, the evening session to be for the consideration of business from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONGER. It has been announced to gentlemen on the other side that our friends on this side had deferred their conference until Tuesday evening next, when they propose to occupy this Hall.

The SPEAKER. The Chair then would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] to ask for a session on Wednesday evening.

Mr. HUNTON. The only objection I have to accepting that suggestion is that we have some bills to pass which will have to go to the Senate for action, and we desire to pass them as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER. A large number of members might desire to be engaged on next Tuesday evening in some other matters than attendance here.

Mr. HUNTON. If objection is made to Tuesday night, I will ask for Wednesday night.

Mr. CONGER. If the House prefers that there should be an evening session for District business on Tuesday, gentlemen on this side will be willing to postpone their business till Wednesday night.

Mr. HUNTON. I will not interfere with any conference that gentlemen may desire to hold.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia now names Wednesday evening.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In order to decide whether to object or not, I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia whether the object is at the proposed night session to go into the consideration of the bill which provides for making the Government of the United States liable for $800,000 of outstanding certificates——

The SPEAKER. That bill is the unfinished business coming from the District Committee.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then as unfinished business it will come up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. McMILLIN. Unless that bill is excepted from the operation of this order, I must object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make a qualified objection.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask my friend from Tennessee not to object. I will tell him two reasons why this session should be held. One bill which we desire to bring up is to enlarge the court buildings——

Mr. McMILLIN. I am willing to consider that.

Mr. HUNTON. If the House is opposed to the bill which the gentleman has referred to let it be voted down. Another important measure which we desire to bring up is the bill providing for a temporary increase of the police force of the District, in view of the inauguration ceremonies. That is very important.

Mr. McMILLIN. I am willing that any measure may come up except the one I have indicated.

Mr. HUNTON. Let that be voted down if the House is opposed to it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the Government ought not to be made liable for those certificates.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] that he cannot make a conditional objection; the objection cannot be entertained unless it is absolute.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do object unless that bill is excepted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COVERT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. KLOTZ. Before that question is put, I desire to ask a conference committee on a bill which has come from the Senate. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KLOTZ] later.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. COVERT, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending paragraph of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS, ETC.

For the purchase and distribution according to law, as provided in sections 526 and 527 of the Revised Statutes, of new and valuable seeds, plants, trees, shrubs, vines, and cuttings, and for testing by cultivation the value of such of them as may require such tests, and for the propagating of such as may be worthy of propagation, and for the distribution of the same among agriculturists in different sections of the country, according to the demands of climate and soil, $80,000.

The CHAIRMAN. To the paragraph just read the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] moved an amendment, to add the proviso which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That hereafter in making such distribution the Commissioner of Agriculture shall apportion three-fourths of all said seeds, plants, trees, vines, and cuttings among the several congressional districts, States, and Territories represented in Congress, according to their number and according to the demands of climate and soil, and he shall, upon the request of any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, distribute the quota due to the State, district, or Territory by him represented to such agricultural constituents therein as he may indicate; and the persons receiving such seeds, &c., shall inform the Department of the results of experiments therewith.

The CHAIRMAN. As a substitute for the paragraph and the amendment, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PERSONS] submitted what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase and propagation and distribution, as required by law, of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expenses of putting up the same, $80,000; an equal proportion of three-fourths of all seeds, plants, and cuttings shall, upon their request, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their agricultural constituents, or shall by their direction be sent to their constituents; and the persons receiving such seeds shall inform the Department of the results of the experiments therewith: Provided, That $3,000 of this sum shall be expended in the discretion of the Commissioner in experiments for the improvement of the varieties and culture of cotton: And provided also, That the Commissioner shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, from whom purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from sending flower, garden, and other seeds to those who apply for the same; and the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of improved and valuable seeds, plants, cuttings, and vines.

Mr. AIKEN. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that anything I may say upon the paragraph under discussion will induce a single member upon this floor to coincide with me in the views I entertain. I am opposed to the text of the bill, because if the Commissioner were allowed to execute the law as prescribed by the statutes organizing the Agricultural Department, the appropriation of $80,000 is more than enough. I am opposed to the amendment presented by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON,] because it requires the Commissioner of Agriculture to credit each member of Congress with a portion of the seeds bought for distribution. And I am still more opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. PERSONS,] because it distributes the purchased seeds without regard to their adaptability to the soil or climate of the section of country to which they are sent, in addition to requiring that three-fourths of all seeds purchased shall be equally distributed to Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. Chairman, it is contended that the agricultural appropriation bill for the present fiscal year repealed the statutes organizing the Department, and that the existing method of distributing seeds promiscuously over the land, without their suitability to the locality sent—cotton-seed to Maine and spring wheat to Florida, &c.—will control the Commissioner of Agriculture through the next fiscal year in this distribution unless otherwise provided in this present bill. I venture the opinion here that upon this subject, as upon all others, there can be found eminent lawyers advocating both sides of the question; but knowing nothing of law myself, I can only suggest that common sense tells me that the moment the money has been expended in purchasing and distributing these seeds, that moment the appropriation bill dies of its own limitation. The $80,000 were expended for the purchase and distribution of seeds, and that done there is an end of that law. The manner of distribution was a mere incidental condition to that particular appropriation, and by no means influences or affects any subsequent appropriation for a similar purpose. Hence the statute remains instructing the Commissioner of Agriculture to distribute these seeds among agriculturists. And here the issue is made that Congressmen know better who are the successful agriculturists in their respective districts than the Commissioner of Agriculture does. Perhaps this is so; but I contend it is not the reputably successful agriculturists that are the most suitable men in whose hands to commit these seeds for propagation, but it is that class of plodding, energetic, painstaking farmers who are more intent upon improving seeds than they are upon the successful management of the farm who are peculiarly suited for this purpose, and such farmers are in every community, but oftener than otherwise are just the men that would be overlooked by Congressmen who must of necessity rely upon the reputation for agricultural success that a farmer has made for himself before he can venture to recommend him.

Nor will I admit that members of Congress are the best authority upon this subject. Two-thirds of this House are professional men, and it is nothing to their discredit to say that they themselves know nothing about farming or practical agriculture; and they have little better opportunity of selecting fit men to execute the purposes of this law than does the Commissioner of Agriculture. And it is my belief that if the voice of the farmers throughout the land could be heard they would prefer relying upon the judgment of the Commissioner of Agriculture in the distribution of these seeds to risking the promiscuous distribution by members of Congress. Gentlemen who assert that they are better qualified than the Commissioner to select parties who should be the recipients of these seeds seem to intimate that the Commissioner would make no effort to find out the most suitable farmers. I would respectfully remind these gentlemen that the present Commissioner addressed a printed circular to every member of Congress almost as soon as he was installed, asking each one to furnish him a list of such farmers in his district as he thought would be most willing and best able to assist him (the Commissioner) in complying with the letter as well as the spirit of the law as contained in the section we are now discussing. From this source, as well as through other channels resorted to by the Commissioner, I am satisfied he has a list of the most practical farmers in every township of every county of every State in this Union, as was asserted yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. This being the case, why is it the House is so clamorous to have control of the bulk of these seeds? It is not for me, Mr. Chairman, to question the motives that actuate any man, but I imagine the ability of congressional favors to buy votes has more to do with it than a desire on the part of the House to assist the Agricultural Department in developing the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. Chairman, for many years Congress has assumed the right, not in conformity to law, but in my judgment in direct violation of law, to control the distribution of these seeds, and have compelled each successive Commissioner of Agriculture so to yield to their behests that he has been forced to buy far more seeds and very different seeds from those which the law suggests he should buy. The law says the Commissioner shall buy rare seeds, plants, bulbs, &c. Now, this morning I took occasion to look over the Commissioner's report with a view to ascertaining where, from whom, at what price, and what variety of seeds, plants, &c., the present Commissioner had purchased for distribution under the provisions of the agricultural appropriation bill for the present fiscal year, and I find that he purchased from B. K. Bliss & Son, of New York, $1,201 worth; from Peter Henderson, of New York, $2,380.50 worth; from James G. Gregory, of Marblehead, Massachusetts, $1,875.32, and from David Landreth & Sons, of Philadelphia, $2,423, or a total of $7,879.83, nearly one-fourth of the entire amount purchased, and I doubt not at prices at which any intelligent farmer could have bought the same seeds from these seed men whose firms as well as their seeds are known throughout the entire country.

Now let us examine the seeds and their prices. First, there were cabbage-seeds varying in price from $1.40 per pound to $10 per pound. Mr. Chairman, I ask for information, can it be presumed that there is anything rare in cabbage seed only worth $1.40 per pound? An examination of the Commissioner's report shows this particular cabbage was "Landreth's large York," a cabbage as old perhaps as Landreth himself; but the Commissioner had to buy it to secure a bulk large enough to divide three fourths of it out to the three hundred and seventy-nine Senators and Representatives in Congress. For the amount purchased he paid $2,870.84, and it will be readily seen that had he confined himself to the purchase of rare seeds, as would have been his choice, doubtless, as required by law, he would only have had a fraction of a pound to give to each member of Congress.

A further examination of this report shows that he purchased forty-two hundred and eighty-seven dollars and eleven cents' worth of wheat at prices varying from $1.25 to $6 per bushel. Think you, Mr. Chairman, that any man owning a rare wheat would sell it for $1.25 per bushel? An examination of the report reveals the fact that this particular wheat of which there were nearly two hundred and fifty bushels purchased has no name, and I commend the prudence of the Commissioner in not naming it, for wheat that is not worth more than $1.25 and $1.30 per bushel is scarcely worthy of a name if it is to be classified as a rare wheat.

The Commissioner also purchased seventy-one hundred and ninety-six dollars and fifty-five cents' worth of early amber cane-seed, at fifteen cents per pound, and this particular purchase will well illustrate my views upon this subject. For three years the Department has distributed this cane-seed, and there I think it should cease. The introduction and distribution of this seed by the Department has conclusively shown that it can be grown with great profit in almost every State above the latitude of this city, and as we travel southward it becomes less valuable. Nothing more should be done by the Department with that seed, and yet the continued demand for it justified the purchase. Indeed there were requests sent to me for this amber cane-seed, as well as to other members, at the very moment that I was grinding them into meal on my own plantation to feed away to cattle, sheep, and hogs, for all of which it is a most admirable food.

I would not condemn this cane, for I have seen two crops of sirup boiled from a single planting, one in July and the other in October, and the second yield was heavier than the first. But the point I make is the Department had done its duty when it introduced, propagated, and distributed into every State in the Union this special cane. Further propagation and distribution of seed of that sorghum should have been left to private enterprise, and the money expended this year for this now by no means rare cane should have been otherwise invested. But the pressure of Congressmen upon the Commissioner in forcing from him to them the distribution of three-fourths of all the seeds purchased necessarily compels him to invest somewhat promiscuously, and prevents the possibility of his conforming to the spirit of the law which organized his Department.

Mr. Chairman, I find in the Commissioner's report another purchase which illustrates, too, my comprehension of what should be the purpose of the Agricultural Department. He bought one pound of coffee at $10. When I inquired what this meant I was told that some years ago the Department offered a premium of $10 for a pound of coffee grown anywhere within the limits of the United States. This was done because property-holders, and doubtless speculators in Lower California, were publishing to the world that coffee could be grown profitably in that State.

The Department, discrediting this assertion, either offered this premium by way of testing the adaptability of that section for the growth of this necessity, for which the United States pays annually many millions of dollars to foreign countries, or to protect purchasers from the imposition of land speculators. No pound of coffee has yet come, Mr. Chairman, from California; but a woman in Southern Florida, seeing the premium offered by the Department, at once set to work to test the climate, latitude, and soil of her section for the growth of this plant, and in a few years she reaped the reward of her labors by receiving $10 from the Department for a pound of coffee grown in her own yard, picked by her own hands, and sent, with a sprig bearing seeds, to the Commissioner. If a stimulus by this means can only be given to the farmers of Southern Florida to grow coffee, and any, even the most limited, success is attained, the Department will not only have been justified for this small expenditure, but the Commissioner would be warranted in making far greater efforts in attempting to make coffee a staple product of Southern Florida.

Mr. Chairman, one very serious objection I have to the practice of distributing seeds to the people through members of Congress is that it brings disrepute upon the Department among the thinking men of this country, who attempt to ridicule it as a mammoth seed store, gotten up by Congress for the purpose of distributing seeds gratuitously to their friends; and further, many Congressmen as well as the people profess to believe that they have a right thus to invest and expend the people's money. To such an extent has this been carried that year after year the same parties send to their Representatives their lists for seed, and never for a moment conclude it is their duty to buy a single package of seed with their own money. If members will only keep their lists from year to year they will be surprised how familiar they will become with these annual solicitations. Indeed, many people now think that Congress does keep a huge seed depository, for I heard a member say he had been requested by one of his constituents to send him one of his catalogues from which to make a selection of the seeds he wanted. No, Mr. Chairman, the practice is all wrong; and if we desire to benefit the Department we should reject the amendments and substitute offered to this section of the bill, and execute the law as it reads, both in letter and spirit.

Mr. COVERT. I desire, if I am permitted to offer an amendment to the pending substitute, to move to strike out, in line 89, the word "eighty" and insert the word "forty;" so the appropriation for this special seed-distribution shall be reduced to $40,000, and to add at the end of the paragraph that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Strike out "$80,000" and insert "$40,000;" also add to the substitute the following:

"Provided also, That the Commissioner shall report as provided in this act the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, from whom purchased, and the date of purchase; and nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from sending flower, garden, and other seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be distributed or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of important and valuable seeds, plants, cuttings, and vines."

Mr. COVERT. I desire to say one word in support of the substitute I have presented. I made the statement to the House yesterday, as an expression of individual opinion, and that opinion is borne out by my friend from South Carolina, that if the phraseology of the original act is strictly adhered to in its spirit so far as this matter of seed distribution is concerned, the expense of the Government in this connection can be reduced just one-half. And it is because of this opinion that this amendment is presented; not as the action of the committee, but as my own individual action.

I hold, sir, that, to a very great extent at least, the amount of money annually appropriated by Congress for the purchase and distribution of seeds goes as a gratuity to an immense number of people in every section of the country who are neither practical farmers nor do they make those reports as to the results of the experiments which they have made with these seeds which can be of any benefit or service to the Department or to the agricultural interests of the country. If we go back to the old landmarks, if we go back to the spirit which prevailed and under which the original bill creating this Department was passed, that these seeds should be distributed to agriculturists who should make reports of their value and successful cultivation, the sum of $40,000, just one-half of the amount appropriated in this section, will be ample to carry out the design of this report. And I sincerely trust that the amendment to the substitute will be adopted in order that this House may show to the country that there is a sincere desire on its part to make this Department what it was originally designed to be under the organic law—a purely experimental department for the benefit of the agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. McGOWAN. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McGOWAN. I make a point of order against the amendment to the substitute that it is not in order.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is too late to make that point.

Mr. McGOWAN. I appeal to the Chair whether it is too late to make the point of order or not.

Mr. HAYES. I make the point of order that it is too late. The question was before the House for consideration and discussion and the point of order should have been made at that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is too late now to raise the question of order against it. There is an amendment pending to the substitute already offered by the gentleman from New York. The question will first be taken on the amendment to the original section of the bill.

Mr. McGOWAN. I wish to say before the Chair proceeds to state the question that the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, took the floor and offered his amendment and then entered into a discussion of it. There was no opportunity to make the point of order until he had concluded. And I made it as soon as I could get the floor.

Mr. COVERT. It is too late to make that point now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. McGOWAN. My point of order is that this proposition changes existing law and is not in the line of reduction of expenditures. I will call the attention of the Chair to the decision of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on yesterday, namely, that the appropriation bill of last year made no permanent legislation with reference to the distribution of seeds. That being true, the amendment proposed this morning does change the statute as contained in sections 526 and 527 of the organic act establishing this Department of Agriculture.

Mr. COVERT. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide the question with a view to facilitating the transaction of public business. The Chair will decide, then, that the gentleman from Michigan would have had the right to make his point of order and take the gentleman from New York off the floor even while discussing his proposed amendments. The Chair holds that it is now too late.

Mr. McGOWAN. I made the point of order as soon as I could get the floor.

Mr. COVERT. But the point of order was not made at the time the amendment was offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not make the point of order at the time, and the Chair holds that it is now too late.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman representing the Committee on Agriculture could not have been anticipated by the committee. The appropriation for the Agricultural Department is now before us for consideration and reported by his committee, namely, the Committee on Agriculture. Now, the chairman of that committee comes in and proposes to amend the report of his own committee by cutting down the $80,000 appropriated in the bill for the distribution of seeds to $40,000. I am opposed to that amount, and believe that the Government can well afford to expend $80,000 annually in the purchase of seeds for the benefit of the farming classes of this country. It is not possible for me, Mr. Chairman, to exaggerate the character or importance of the agricultural interests of the United States. It is a very small item after all in our aggregate expenses to allow this annual sum for the purchase and distribution of rare and useful seeds. I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] that the Commissioner of Agriculture should purchase rare seeds as contemplated in the original act, and that it is his duty to do so. But he may purchase rare seeds with $80,000 as well as rare seeds with $40,000, and if he purchases rare seeds at all it is a matter of very considerable importance how the seeds are to be distributed.

Now, I do not sympathize with those who argue that all these seeds should be distributed by the Department. I state, Mr. Chairman, that the Representative from an agricultural district, if worthy of the trust to which he has been assigned by his constituents, is better qualified to distribute at least three-fourths of all the seeds than the Commissioner of Agriculture himself can possibly be. I know the farmers in my district. I know the enterprising farmers in my district. I know those who are anxious to get new and rare and valuable seeds. I know of men who will give them a fair and careful test, and the men who will return a report to the Commissioner of Agriculture as to their success and the result of their experiments with them; and I venture the assertion that more reports have been made from the men to whom I have sent rare seeds than from those who have been selected by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and to whom he has sent them himself.

We all know as a matter of fact that in many of our counties the officers of the county agricultural societies are not practical farmers. Frequently a lawyer is selected as secretary or other high officer of the agricultural association. Frequently he is a man who owns fast horses and wants to get himself elected secretary or treasurer or perhaps president of the agricultural county fair. That is the man who will get all the seeds for the county, and he will not know what to do with them and will not dispose of them regularly and fairly. I remember four years ago I requested the Commissioner to give me a half bushel of a certain quality of wheat which he was distributing. He declined, saying he was unable to do it; he had distributed the quantity he had to the agricultural societies. I went home and went into my post-office, and in the post-office was a half bushel of wheat sent to the secretary of the agricultural society, that was being eaten up by the mice in the office. That secretary had not an inch of land in the world. He had no interest in agriculture; he had an interest in a fast horse, and was, in fact, the county agricultural society. Now I insist I am better qualified, as the representative of the farmers of my district, to make a distribution than the secretary of any society in my district.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] to the pending paragraph.

Mr. KEIFER. I desire to call attention to the state of the question. The gentleman from New York, if he had observed carefully, would have seen that in the substitute the latter part of his amendment already appears. So we do not want to vote on that. The amendment was to strike out $80,000 and insert $40,000, and add certain words, which are found in the amendment.

Mr. COVERT. That is understood.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition pending is the amendment to the paragraph offered by the gentleman from Kansas, which the Clerk will now read.

Mr. HAYES and Mr. CONVERSE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on that amendment, and a vote must now be had upon it. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:

"Provided, That hereafter in making such distribution the Commissioner of Agriculture shall apportion three-fourths of the said seeds, plants, trees, shrubs, vines, and cuttings among the several congressional districts, States, and Territories, represented in Congress, according to their number and according to the demands of climate and soil; and he shall, upon the request of any Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, distribute the quota due to the State, district, or Territory by him represented to such agricultural constituents therein as he may indicate, and the persons receiving such seeds, &c., shall inform the Department of the results of experiments therewith."

Mr. CONVERSE. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on the pending amendment and no further amendment is in order.

Mr. ANDERSON. I rise to a question of order. The amendment which has just been read is an amendment to the paragraph. Then a substitute was offered by the gentleman from Georgia, and to that substitute an amendment has been offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COVERT.] Does the vote come first on my amendment which has now been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee must first perfect the pending paragraph. The vote is on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

Several MEMBERS. Let it be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The question being taken by a viva voce vote, the chairman stated that in the opinion of the Chair the "noes" had it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I call for a division.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman who has this bill in charge.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The House is now dividing.

Mr. YEATES. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. YEATES. The gentleman from Kansas offered an amendment. The gentleman from Georgia offered a substitute for that amendment. Does not that come up first?

The CHAIRMAN. The vote must first be taken on the amendment to the pending paragraph, which has been read twice. The order is to perfect the paragraph before voting on the substitute.

Mr. VALENTINE. Does the Chair rule that an amendment to the paragraph should be voted on before the substitute?

Mr. YEATES. I had not completed my inquiry. The gentleman from Kansas offered an amendment. Then the gentleman from Georgia offered a substitute for that amendment. Then the gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] offered an amendment to the substitute. On which question is the vote to be first taken?

The CHAIRMAN. The first vote is on the amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBOTT. The gentleman from Kansas offered an amendment yesterday. The gentleman from Georgia offered a substitute for that amendment, and that substitute was reported by the Clerk. I wish to ask what would be the effect of a vote on the amendment without disposing of the substitute? Would not that carry the whole thing with it? Ought not the vote to be first on the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. No, sir. The Clerk will read the rule for the satisfaction of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. CONVERSE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. VALENTINE. There is a question of order now pending. Let that be settled first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

When a motion or proposition is under consideration, a motion to amend and a motion to amend that amendment shall be in order, and it shall also be in order to offer a further amendment by way of substitute, to which one amendment may be offered, but which shall not be voted on until the original matter is perfected.

Mr. CONVERSE. I made the motion a while ago to amend the amendment by striking out the last word, and I understood the Chair to rule my amendment to the amendment out of order. I desire again to inquire of the Chair whether I have not a right to move to amend the amendment.

Mr. HAYES. I made the same motion to amend the amendment by striking out the last word.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to offer that amendment for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, who has this bill in charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is in the nature of a further amendment.

Mr. CONVERSE. The rule, as I understand it, says we may perfect the original bill or section first; that there may be an amendment to that, and also an amendment to the amendment, to be disposed of before a substitute is voted on. Now, Mr. Chairman, I propose an amendment to the amendment to the original paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] moves to strike out the last word of the amendment. The gentleman is recognized for that amendment.

Mr. CONVERSE. Now, I desire to make the inquiry of the gentleman who has the bill in charge, what is the mode you propose whereby the Commissioner of Agriculture is to be placed in communication with the agriculturists all over the country? Has he got at the Agricultural Department a list of the men to whom he can intelligently distribute these seeds? If not, then on whom does he rely to make this distribution?

Mr. COVERT. I will say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] what I said to the committee yesterday, that the Commissioner of Agriculture has in his Department the names of reliable correspondents in every town, in every county, in every State in this Union; men who are connected with agricultural societies; men who have established reputation in their own localities of devotion to the cause of agriculture and of active participation in the interest of agriculture. I said then what I say now, that it seems to me that it is to men like these that seeds should be sent, so that the Department can have information as to the result of their cultivation.

My amendment seeks to limit the amount of the appropriation by cutting it down just one-half. If one-half of the amount here proposed is devoted to the purchase of seeds to be sent to men like these instead of being sent generally over the country, it seems to me that very much better results will follow the distribution.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desired to call the attention of the committee to this subject, and claim, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] claims, that persons who represent constituencies in this House know better who among their constituents are practical agriculturists than does any mere secretary of an agricultural society; and such representatives here would be quite as responsible to the people, as a general thing, as any officer of the Government would be.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. CONVERSE. One more remark. I will say that I believe I represent on this floor the most important and productive agricultural district in the United States. [Laughter.]

Many MEMBERS. Except mine.

Mr. CONVERSE. I will not except any, and I think the statistics will show it. In that connection I desire to say that I do not believe twenty persons in my district per year have received seeds from the Agricultural Department except through the member representing that district. I remember that when the chairman of this committee [Mr. COX] was the Representative from my district in this House the people of my district were well served in respect to receiving from the Agricultural Department seeds. He attended to the business for his constituents. Since then their interests have not been so well attended to. For one, I desire to say earnestly and to urge that three-fourths of the seeds, cuttings, &c., from the Department ought, in the interest of agriculture, to be distributed through the medium of members of Congress.

Mr. PERSONS. I had the honor of introducing the commissioner of agriculture of the State of Georgia to Commissioner Le Duc. I have nothing to say against Commissioner Le Duc. I am of the opinion that he is one of the very best men, if not the very best man, that has ever been at the head of that Department. But it is easily proven that he is without the necessary information to distribute these seeds in the best manner. I myself saw a list of his correspondents in the State of Georgia, and I was told by the commissioner of agriculture of that State that in one of the most important counties in the State there was but one solitary farmer who was on that list of correspondents, and he run but one plow.

Mr. NEW. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NEW. I think we are all anxious to hear the views of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. PERSONS.] For one I was very much interested, so far as I was able to hear him yesterday. He cannot be heard with all this confusion, and I hope that the Chair will direct members to take their seats and have order restored so that we may hear him.

The CHAIRMAN. All members will take their seats, except the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. PERSONS,] and the committee will come to order. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Georgia will proceed.

Mr. PERSONS. I wish to say that in making reference in this presence of great lawyers to "law" I only mean the law of the distribution of seeds. I wish to say that the Committee on Agriculture, of which I am a member, considered long and, as we believed, well, a year ago, how these seeds should be distributed. We came before this House with a report and asked you to adopt our bill as reported, which you did.

I know of no complaint of that plan save that made by members, who say that information being thus given to the people of this country that they had a right to these seeds, their constituents demanded seeds of them, and they would be glad to be rid of that trouble. Now, it is known to the country that members had the right to distribute these seeds. It will be known to the country that members themselves have voted away that right, if they do not continue to hold it; and they cannot escape the trouble of this distribution without, I apprehend, inviting censure from their constituents.

The very argument made by the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN,] and the information which he gave this House this morning of the kinds of seeds that were bought and what prices were paid for them, he would have been wholly unable to have given to this House but for the law we made last year. He never before knew where they were bought.

Mr. AIKEN. Ever since I have been in Congress that information has been published in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. PERSONS. We did not find it last year as members of the committee. The Commissioner did not make his report to Congress; he made it to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WILBER. The information was accessible.

Mr. PERSONS. I think $80,000 is a small amount to be appropriated for this purpose, when we come to consider the great good it will do the country. These agricultural seeds are in great demand all over the country. The demand comes from every section; and this is the fairest law possible, for it divides these seeds equitably, giving to each Senator or Member and each Delegate a fair proportion for distribution.

The objection is that under this provision the North gets cotton-seed which it does not want, and the South gets spring wheat which it does not want. But, as I remarked yesterday, some of us get public documents which do not suit our particular section; but we easily exchange them. You might as well undertake to determine how the books published by Congress shall be distributed as to try to regulate in detail the distribution of seeds. [Here the hammer fell.] I will merely add that my substitute does not change the law as we made it last year.

Mr. CONVERSE withdrew his pro forma amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I renew the formal amendment. Mr. Chairman, I regret not a little that the gentleman in charge of this appropriation bill comes here and so early in its consideration attacks his own work. It seemed to some of us as though a majority at least of the Committee on Agriculture had taken a great deal of pains to change the existing law on the subject of distribution of seeds, plants, &c., over the country. After having considered all that we find the chairman of the committee willing this morning to strike out half of the appropriations; and then he makes a speech against this system of distribution.

As it appears that while we are here on this floor we are all experienced agriculturists, we ought all to have a little to say on this subject. I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Kansas, and I do not object to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Georgia as a whole; but I think the latter undertakes to change existing law, and to do that which is always dangerous in a matter of legislation. I wish to call attention to that clause in the proposed substitute which undertakes to legislate in the interest of a single article of seed. The substitute proposes to devote $3,000 of the sum appropriated to the purchase and distribution of cotton-seed alone. Now it was stated here yesterday—I believe by my colleague from the Toledo district, [Mr. HURD]—that cotton is again king in this country. But the gentleman forgets that cotton has never been king in this country, as compared with the other products of the land. At least, looking back into the statistics for twenty years, it has never been equal to the common grass that is growing all over the country without any special cultivation.

Cotton is not the equivalent of the hay grown in this country. Yet it is a very important article, to be grown in the Southern country, and very valuable. But I am opposed to saying that $3,000 of the $80,000 proposed to be appropriated shall be devoted to the purchase of common cotton seed; for that is what it means. I am in favor of leaving the discretion where it always has been left—with the Commissioner of Agriculture, regulated as it is by section 526 of our Revised Statutes, giving him the discretion to purchase rare and valuable articles of seed. Let the distribution include cotton-seed, corn, if you please, all kinds of seed that the country needs and that should be distributed over the country generally.

I am in favor of giving to members of Congress the right to direct the distribution of the greater part of these seeds and plants, because I believe they are capable of distributing them to the proper persons. They get applications from the proper persons, for in all the agricultural districts of this country the agriculturists select men whom they are willing to trust in this matter. With the exception of the clause in the substitute to which I am now calling attention, I am disposed to favor it.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I am opposed to all these amendments and substitutes. I am in favor of the clause embraced in the original bill as reported from the Committee on Agriculture, providing for the purchase and distribution of seeds. I stand here as a friend to the Agricultural Department, and of the agricultural interests of this country. Like the gentleman from Ohio, I have the honor to represent a large agricultural district; and I know something in regard to the wants of the agriculturists of that district. I am in favor of this appropriation of $80,000 for the purchase and distribution of seeds. I am in favor even of expending a larger sum for the purpose, if we can put these seeds into such hands that they will benefit the agriculturists of the country. But I am decidedly opposed to purchasing, as has been done in the past, seeds that amount to absolutely nothing, or seeds which can be bought in any quantity at any seed store in any village of the land for a trifle. If we can buy rare seeds and plants and put them in the hands of practical men, where they will do good, I am in favor of the expenditure. But I am opposed to the distribution through members of Congress. Some gentlemen say that members of Congress know best who are the practical agriculturists of their districts. I say that the men who run our county and district fairs, the men who are themselves farmers, are those who understand best in regard to this matter. I would rather trust the secretary of any agricultural society in any county in my district to name the men to whom these seeds should be sent than to name them myself, because I think that the seeds, if sent to parties named by men identified with the agricultural interests, would be more likely to get into the hands of practical agriculturists than if sent to parties named by myself. Results are what I want. When we expend $80,000 each year for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of seeds and plants, I want something to show for it. These seeds and plants should be placed in the hands of men who will test them in their particular locality and then report the result to the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion? If the Commissioner of Agriculture desires to get reports from persons to whom seeds are sent, all he has to do is to fold with each package of seed a request that the person receiving them shall report the results to him.

Mr. HAYES. Yes; but the packages sent out by members of Congress go, in nine cases out of ten, to parties whose only object is to get the seeds, and after that care nothing about the matter. Indeed, they would not report the result of their experiment if urged to do it. Now, let the Commissioner of Agriculture select one man, two men, or three men, where the county is large, in each county in the country, who are practical agriculturists and who will take an interest in the matter, send seeds or plants to them for experiment, ask them to report to him the result, and then we shall get something in the line of practical results—something to show for the money we are expending.

Mr. COVERT. I withdraw my formal amendment.

Mr. McGOWAN. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Agriculture gave this matter very careful consideration. They went back to the statute and undertook to conform this agricultural appropriation bill to the provisions of that statute so these seeds might be distributed in accordance with its intent and spirit.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I take direct issue with my colleague on the committee from Georgia [Mr. PERSONS] when he says that his constituents are entitled to seeds. No man of his own right in this country is entitled to seeds. We have no right to take the people's money to purchase seeds with which to plant our constituents' kitchen gardens.

It is a notorious fact that with this great appropriation of $80,000 a year the Commissioner has had more money than was necessary to buy such seeds as are provided by the statute; that is, new, rare, and valuable seeds for distribution, and the result has been he has purchased white beans, cabbage seed, turnip seed, cucumber seed, and just such seeds as you and I can go to any seed store in the country and purchase for ourselves. He has bought them of the Rochester seed men and of Dean & Perry in my own city, and of Landreth & Son, other seed men of Philadelphia, to the extent of $5,000 and $10,000; ordinary and not new and rare seeds. Therefore the committee undertook to hold the Commissioner hereafter down to the provisions of the statute, remembering that statute was enacted after due deliberation and careful consideration and believing it to be conservative and right to do so.

We are simply violating every principle of this Government when we take the people's money to buy seeds in order that members of Congress may distribute them to their constituents, and thus save to those constituents the expense of ten cents each and going to the corner grocery to buy them.

Mr. BRAGG. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. McGOWAN. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. If the Commissioner of Agriculture has violated the law by buying such poor seeds for distribution, and has so squandered the public money in years past, with all the limitations we have been able to put upon him, why is it the Committee on Agriculture now recommend that we repeal all limitations and trust to his discretion as the only proper course to buy rare seeds to distribute to distinguished agriculturists?

Mr. McGOWAN. The question of the gentleman from Wisconsin involves two errors. In the first place, I did not say that he had purchased poor seeds, and, in the second place, I did not say, and I do not believe, we have attempted to repeal any law which restrains him. On the contrary, sir——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. McGOWAN. I hope the interruption will not be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yielded to the interruption and, of course, it will be taken out of his time.

Mr. COVERT. I am constrained, Mr. Chairman, to move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto to one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. TALBOTT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. COVERT. I now move the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all debate be limited to one minute.

Several MEMBERS. Say ten minutes.

Mr. COVERT. I cannot; but must insist on closing debate in one minute so we may get through with this agricultural appropriation bill during the day.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the motion to go into committee, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto, by order of the House, has been closed in one minute.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a mystery to me how this agricultural bill ever got into this House in the shape in which we find it. It asks for an appropriation of $80,000 for the purchase of seeds, and yet nearly every member of the Agricultural Committee who has been on the floor seems opposed to the bill as it stands.

Now, how did it get here if the committee is opposed to it? It appropriates the utterly inadequate sum of $80,000 for the purchase of seeds and plants throughout the whole country. Now, there are in the United States 27,000,000 of people directly employed in agricultural pursuits. It is proposed to reduce the amount for purchasing seeds, plants, &c., to $40,000. That is $1 to each six hundred and seventy-five who are engaged in this pursuit, or to the whole population, who share more or less in the division, about one dollar to 1,300 persons, or thirteen people will receive one cent's worth. I hope a false economy will not strike us just here. Of course there are some losses, but all the money ever expended in this line has returned tenfold in increased production and wealth. I believe the benefits from a single variety of wheat sent out by this Department would more than reimburse the Government for all the money ever expended for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The formal amendment is withdrawn. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON,] which will be read.

Mr. ANDERSON'S amendment was again read.

Mr. DIBRELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the first vote on the substitute of the gentleman from New York?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided over and over again that the first question is on perfecting the original paragraph.

Mr. WHITE. The gentleman from Georgia offered a substitute for that proposition, and is not the question first on his amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The first question, as the Chair has already stated, will be on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. ANDERSON.]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 67.

Mr. ANDERSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. COVERT were appointed.

Mr. CONVERSE. There is a misunderstanding about this amendment, and I ask to have it again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 52.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] to the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$80,000" and insert "$40,000."

Mr. DIBRELL. When will the vote be taken upon the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The first vote will be taken upon the amendment and then upon the substitute. The question now is on the proposition to strike out "$80,000" and insert "$40,000."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KEIFER. I wish to make a motion to amend the substitute.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. I would like to have the paragraph as amended read, and then the proposed substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio proposes to amend the substitute. The Chair will first entertain the amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I move to strike out from the substitute the words commencing with "provided" where it first occurs in the substitute and including the words "that $3,000 of this sum shall be expended in the discretion of the Commissioner in experiments for the improvement of the varieties and culture of cotton."

Mr. WHITE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE. I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas has been adopted. Now the gentleman from Georgia has offered a substitute for the whole section. Do I understand that the substitute is the law of last year?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not for the Chair to answer.

Mr. WHITE. Can I have an answer from the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. PERSONS. It is substantially the law of last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Georgia, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, beginning with line 80, down to line 89 as amended, and insert: "For the purchase and propagation and distribution, as required by law, of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expenses of putting up the same, $80,000; an equal proportion of three-fourths of all seeds, plants, and cuttings shall, upon their request, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their agricultural constituents, or shall by their direction be sent to their constituents; and the persons receiving such seeds shall inform the Department of the results of the experiments therewith: Provided, That $3,000 of this sum shall be expended in the discretion of the Commissioner in experiments for the improvement of the varieties and culture of cotton: And provided also, That the Commissioner shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, from whom purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Commissioner of Agriculture from sending flower, garden, and other seeds to those who apply for the same; and the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of improved and valuable seeds, plants, cuttings and vines."

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 44.

Mr. ANDERSON. I ask for tellers.

Mr. HAYES. No quorum having voted, it would be in order for the Chair to order tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. COVERT. I trust my friend from Kansas will withdraw his demand for tellers, as we are anxious to proceed to finish this bill before two o'clock, the hour fixed for adjournment.

Mr. WARNER. If he withdraws the demand I will renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Before doing so the committee will rise informally to receive a message from the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LOUNSBERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, was received, announcing that the Senate had accepted the invitation extended by the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the late Hon. FERNANDO WOOD to-day.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask for the reading of the message from the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The message will be read, unless there be objection.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
February 19, 1881.

Resolved, That pursuant to the invitation of the House of Representatives the Senate will adjourn this day at two o'clock p. m. in order to permit the members and officers of the Senate to attend the funeral of Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New York, at his late residence in this city, at three o'clock p. m.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate the foregoing resolution to the House of Representatives.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers having been demanded, the Chair will appoint as such Mr. ANDERSON and Mr. PERSONS.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 34.

So the substitute was adopted.

Mr. WHITE. I now move to strike out from the substitute all that portion of it which provides that $3,000 shall be expended for the improvement in the culture of cotton.

Mr. CHALMERS. That has already been voted down once to-day.

Mr. VALENTINE. I make the point of order that it has been voted upon and rejected by the committee.

Mr. WHITE. This is to strike out a portion only of that substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the following words from the substitute:

("Provided, That $3,000 of this sum shall be expended, in the discretion of the Commissioner, in experiments for the improvement of the varieties and culture of cotton.

Mr. VALENTINE. Now I make the point of order that that has just been voted down by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order on the ground that this identical proposition has already been acted upon and rejected by the committee.

Mr. WHITE. But this is only to strike out a portion of the substitute.

Mr. VALENTINE. The same motion was made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER,] and was disagreed to by the committee. I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FINLEY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] what are his reasons for striking out that portion of the substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. WHITE. I am not permitted to answer the gentleman now, but will do so privately.

The Clerk read the following:

Investigation as to insects injurious to agriculture:

For investigating the history and habits of insects injurious to agriculture; for experiments in ascertaining the best means of destroying them; chemicals, traveling, and other expenses in the practical work of the entomological division, $15,000: Provided, That to enable the entomological commission to complete and publish the data already obtained by them, with the investigations made, the sum of $5,000 of said sum of $15,000 is hereby appropriated, to be expended under the direction of said commission; and the report of the said commission, and an itemized statement of their expenditures, shall be made to the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:

"And the Commissioner is hereby authorized and directed to furnish in the next report of the Agricultural Department a comparison of the agricultural products of the United States for the period since 1861 and those of the like period of twenty years immediately preceding 1861."

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this amendment calls for some important and interesting information without requiring any special appropriation or expenditure, which I think will be of special interest in throwing some light upon propositions that were suggested yesterday by my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] especially in reference to the disastrous consequences of the protective system upon the agriculture of our country.

During the last year to June 30, 1880, the agricultural exports of our country have been no less than $685,961,091. During the month of December last they were nearly twelve millions' worth more than in any one month in our history.

Now, I do not desire to go into any general discussion on this question at this time. But my colleague referred, and eloquently, to the halcyon days "between 1850 and 1860," when he said that under the good old democratic rule there was no protective tariff to embarrass the industries and the prosperity of the people. I am not going to attempt any answer myself. I will bring an authority that can answer in thirteen lines the whole argument on that branch of the subject which the gentleman made, ornate and flowery as it was. I admired the courage of my colleague, and I admired the courage of his colleagues on that side of the House, and their delight as they almost uniformly applauded him for his free-trade doctrines, especially in view of the fact of the humiliating attitude of their retreat in the midst of a canvass of their advocacy of that doctrine, which they had inscribed in their platform. The gentleman himself admitted the attempted change of front, and claimed it as one cause of their defeat. But the country had no faith in the professions of that party for protection in some places or for free trade in other localities. The people knew that however national the tariff issue may be, democratic profession of faith in it is absolutely "a local question." In the manufacturing districts of Ohio our democratic friends and that press declare themselves for protection, and I looked yesterday with some interest on that side of this House very generally applauding the most radical, not to say violent, free-trade utterances.

I have here thirteen lines that I desire to have read in this connection by the Clerk in his very best voice, for it is instructive history and lets in a flood of light on this whole subject. I ask the Clerk to read the part I have marked. It is from the annual message of James Buchanan, sent to Congress 8th December, 1857, exactly during the decade to which my colleague so triumphantly referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

We have possessed all the elements of material wealth in rich abundance, and yet notwithstanding all these advantages our country, in its monetary interests, is at the present moment in a deplorable condition. In the midst of unsurpassed plenty in all the productions of agriculture and in all the elements of national wealth, we find our manufactures suspended, our public works retarded, our private enterprises of different kinds abandoned, and thousands of useful laborers thrown out of employment and reduced to want. The revenue of the Government, which is chiefly derived from duties on imports from abroad, has been greatly reduced while the appropriations made by Congress at its last session for the current fiscal year are very large in amount. Under these circumstances a loan may be required before the close of your present session; but this, although deeply to be regretted, would prove to be only a slight misfortune when compared with the suffering and distress prevailing among the people.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, yesterday we had the poetry, the ideal beauties of free trade. My gifted colleague gave free rein to fancy and treated us to imaginary pictures of the glories of "white-winged free trade" that are to come in some Utopian future. The few lines that I have caused to be read reveal the cold, ugly, passionless facts concerning the said "white-winged" and its malign influence among the actualities of our national life. It is history. That outline was drawn by the hand of the last democratic President. It matters not that he attributes that wide-spread distress in part to other causes. That does not change the fact that continuously for thirteen years, and almost continuously for twenty-eight years the democratic party had controlled the Government which it had at last thus brought to the verge of ruin. During that time the protective system had been broken down, and with it down went the prosperity of all our industries. I will ask attention now only to two or three illustrations among hundreds which might be adduced. From 1828 to 1832 under fair protection our iron product increased 53 per cent. In 1832 under revenue policy the duty was reduced to 20 per cent. ad valorem, and from 1832 to 1842 our iron products did not increase one pound. Under a protective tariff that product increased 400 per cent. From 1846 to 1860 it increased only 11 per cent. under another revenue-tariff crusade. But from 1860 to 1876, under protection, it has increased more than 250 per cent., and last year the wages paid to labor in that industry alone was over fifty-three million dollars, and every stimulated and active industry means larger employment of intelligent labor, utilized resources, and increased wealth and prosperity for all classes and all interests. It is instructive to note the declaration of President Buchanan that the "revenue had been greatly decreased," though they then enjoyed the blessings of a tariff constructed specially "for revenue," and that, though a period of peace, "a loan may be required." It was required. And so low had the credit and standing of the Government fallen that an exorbitant interest was also "required."

In the history of our country for the last fifty years that party has never come into power without attempting to break down the protective system, and never in breaking down that without damage and sometimes ruin to the industries and prosperity of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I trust some of my democratic friends will move to extend my time, as I have been reading from the message of a democratic President.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Machinery, apparatus, and experiments in the manufacture of sugar:

For expenses of machinery and apparatus, labor, &c., to continue experiments in the manufacture of sugar from sorghum and other sugar-producing plants, $25,000, to be available immediately; and out of the above sum the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to pay the chief chemist $1,000 as additional compensation for the next fiscal year.

Mr. GILLETTE and Mr. ROBERTSON addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa, Mr. GILLETTE, has been recognized.

Mr. GILLETTE. I move to strike out the last word, in order to obtain five minutes.

It will be remembered by many members of this House when the last agricultural appropriation bill was before us I made three or four different efforts to amend it by way of making an appropriation to enable the Agricultural Department to experiment in the manufacture of sugar from sorghum and from corn-stalks. The Agricultural Committee refused to allow that amendment to even be considered by the House under the rules, which I then characterized and still regard as most tyrannical. Not disposed to succumb to opposition in this most important matter, I then presented the case, with my colleague, General WEAVER, and one other gentleman who was a member of the Agricultural Committee, (one of the four practical farmers upon that committee,) to the Senate Agricultural Committee, and secured by amendment in the Senate an appropriation of $15,000 upon the same bill. The chairman of the House Agricultural Committee opposed the Senate amendment, but it was finally agreed in conference to appropriate $7,500, one-half the amount in the amendment.

I now desire to say the result of that appropriation has been so marvelous that even the very chairman of the committee, who so earnestly opposed me when I tried to amend his bill a year ago, comes before the House to-day himself and places in the bill another appropriation of $25,000 for this same purpose. I shall not have time to say what I wish to say as to the results of the experiments made under this appropriation in the five minutes allotted to me; but I have here two samples [holding them up in either hand] of the sugar which the Department manufactured in large quantities, one from corn-stalks and one from sorghum. And according to these experiments the cost of producing such pure light sugar from sorghum is only three cents per pound, while the duty on the same quality of sugar, if imported, as I was told this very morning in the Treasury Department, would be three cents and forty-four hundredths of a cent per pound. In other words, we can in the Northwest produce pure sugar for less than the duties upon it to-day. One thirty-fourth part of the State which I have the honor in part to represent can produce as much sugar per annum as we now import.

In other words, 1,039,182 acres out of the 35,228,800 acres of alluvial lands in the State of Iowa can produce an amount of sugar equal to the importations into this country of that article at a cost less than the duties now paid upon sugar. Our imports of sugar, sirups, &c., during the last fiscal year amounted to 1,727,121,816 pounds, and cost, including duties, $131,000,000. The experiments at the Agricultural Department show an average product per acre in sorghum sugar of 1,662 pounds, besides sirup, 800 pounds. This result was produced with experiments upon some very poor varieties of sorghum mixed in with the better. These will be discarded in the future. Estimating the sugar at eight cents per pound, we have for sugar per acre, $132.96, besides 800 pounds of sirup.

It must be borne in mind that the sorghum crop makes very slight drain upon the soil—much less than corn.

The experiments in the manufacture of sugar from cornstalks were not so satisfactory, because the preparation was not made until too late, but 960 pounds of sugar or at that rate per acre have been obtained from cornstalks after the corn was gathered. The Commissioner reports two attempts to manufacture sugar from cornstalks on a large scale by parties who preserve sweet corn, one in Iowa and one in Illinois, and both parties report they are so much encouraged that they will go on and perfect their machinery.

Mr. BRIGGS. Why do you not produce it now?

Mr. GILLETTE. We are preparing to do so, and have been led to make the attempt by the success of the experiments made by the Agricultural Department. We will soon produce it. There is no doubt about it. The practicability has been demonstrated and profits shown. I believe this provision of the bill is the most important one in it, and I hope it will be adopted without a dissenting vote. I believe a much larger appropriation would be made if this House began to comprehend the vast importance and practicability of producing our sugars at home rather than by purchase abroad. Especially to the Northwest is this discovery of her sugar-producing capabilities a bonanza.

The total consumption of sugar in this country last year was forty-one and three-fourths pounds per capita. I say to the mortgage-ridden, overtaxed farmers of the West, here is hope for you. Divert the vast sums now paid to foreigners for sugars into your own section, and it will sweeten your lives and exalt your calling. It will be like a rain of manna from Heaven to you. It will be an emancipation proclamation from the slavery of usury and the curse of mortgages.

Mr. COVERT. I had expected that we might complete the consideration of this bill to-day; but it seems hopeless, and I therefore move that the committee now rise.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Before that motion is put, I desire to offer an amendment to complete the pending paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That will be in order when the committee again resumes consideration of this bill.

The motion of Mr. COVERT was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Under amendment 2 it strikes out the words "and length of service" as ambiguous and unnecessary.

Under amendments 11 and 12 the condition of payment for Army transportation due land-grant railroads is made more definite, and made only in full of all demands.

Under amendment 15, $50,000 of the amount appropriated for manufacture of arms at national armories may be expended by the Secretary of War on the manufacture or purchase of magazine guns to be selected by a board of officers to be appointed by said Secretary.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the terms of the United States circuit and district courts now held at Exeter, for and within the district of New Hampshire, be, and the same hereafter shall be, held at Concord, in said district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a memorial of the National Tobacco Board of Trade, and a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, in respect to the tobacco trade of the United States with certain foreign countries. I ask that the joint resolution of the General Assembly may be reported at length.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas, as under date of February 6, 1880, a memorial was addressed by the Tobacco Board of Trade of Nashville, to the Congress of the United States, setting forth the fact "that a great injury and manifest injustice is being done to one of the largest agricultural interests in the country and to every one interested in the purchase or sale of one of our great staples, produced in thirteen different States of this Union," namely, leaf-tobacco; and

Whereas "this great injury and manifest injustice" is caused by the fact, as further set forth in said memorial, that in the countries of France, Spain, Italy, and Austria, in Europe, the importation and sale of this great staple of our country is made a government monopoly, and that in no other way than through this government monopoly is tobacco allowed to be imported into their dominions, and this to the great detriment of the thousands in this country interested as producers or dealers therein, by depriving them of competition in the sale thereof; and

Whereas a further memorial was, by his excellency the governor of Tennessee, the members of the supreme court, and many other prominent officials of this State, as well as by Hon. Connally F. Trigg, judge of the United States circuit court; W. M. Woodcock, collector of internal revenue, and many other worthy officers of the United States Government, resident in Tennessee, addressed to the Congress of the United States, referring to the said memorial of the Nashville Tobacco Board of Trade, and expressing the "desire fully to indorse all the allegations and complaints, and unite in the prayer of said memorial for relief," and further setting forth "that the grievances complained of not only affect prejudicially and disastrously all dealers in leaf-tobacco in the several markets of these United States, and are ruinous to the producer, who is dependent on the same for the maintenance of himself and family, but, being one of the chief staples, is intimately interwoven with the general commerce of this and the many other States of this Union in which it is produced. Further, any act, circumstance, or influence that affects injuriously this great staple, by depressing its value, impeding its sale, or in any other way, permeates through all the industrial and commercial interests of the many States of the Union which produce or deal therein, and is alike injurious and hurtful to all these interests;" and

Whereas many other memorials were addressed to the Congress of the United States by the Board of Trade of Corksville, and other important leaf-tobacco markets, and by planters of this and other States interested, indorsing the allegations and complaints, and uniting in the prayer for relief of the Nashville Board of Trade; and

Whereas, during the month of February, 1880, the Legislatures of Virginia and Kentucky did pass resolutions instructing their Senators in Congress and requesting their Representatives "to use their influence and all legitimate and honorable means to induce Congress and the State Department at Washington to take steps, and use every effort to do away with this unjust and unreasonable discrimination against this our great staple, and to cause the present regie system for the purchase and sale of leaf-tobacco within the dominions of the aforementioned European governments to be abolished, and the markets of these four great governments made open markets, into which all persons who desire to do so may import, and thus protect this great staple, which furnishes the means of support not only to thousands of families in this Commonwealth, but in thirteen different States of this Union; and

Whereas Hon. JOHN F. HOUSE, in pursuance of said memorial of the Nashville Tobacco Board of Trade and a letter previously addressed by him to the Secretary of State of the United States, did, on the — day of February, 1880, introduce in the Congress of the United States a joint resolution requesting the President of these United States to open negotiations with the four great Governments before mentioned, namely, France, Spain, Italy, and Austria, with a view to securing the relief asked in the aforementioned memorials and resolutions, which joint resolution was passed by the unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress of the United States; and

Whereas his Excellency the President of the United States has as yet taken no action, as requested by said joint resolution of Congress, to relieve this great staple of the oppressive burdens and the unjust discrimination to which it is subjected by the operation of the regie monopolies of the four great Governments of Europe before mentioned, namely, France, Spain, Italy, and Austria; and

Whereas the people of this Commonwealth are largely engaged in the production, purchase, and sale of leaf-tobacco, consequently suffer great damage and loss by the operation of these regie monopolies of European governments: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Tennessee in Legislature assembled, That his Excellency the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, most earnestly requested to take immediate action in the matter, in accordance with the aforementioned joint resolution of the Congress of the United States and to the great relief of the citizens of this and many other States of this Union: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That our Senators in Congress be, and they are hereby, instructed, and our Representatives requested, to exert themselves to the utmost of their influence and ability to secure the relief prayed for in the aforementioned memorials, as of the greatest importance to the agricultural and commercial interests of the State.

Resolved, That copies of this preamble and these resolutions be forwarded to his Excellency the President of the United States, and to the honorable Secretary of State of the United States, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Resolved, That copies of the same be also forwarded to the governors of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, Kentucky, Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Connecticut, with the request that they present the subject-matter thereof to the Legislatures of their respective States for their consideration, with the recommendation that they take such action as they may think appropriate and as will best serve to secure the common relief of the citizens of our several States as being most largely interested therein, in accordance with the several memorials and joint resolutions of Congress before mentioned.

H. B. RAMSEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
GEO. H. MORGAN,
Speaker of the Senate.

Approved January 22, 1881.

ALVIN HAWKINS,
Governor.

Mr. HARRIS. I move the reference of the joint resolution and the memorial to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Connecticut; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE,
General Assembly, January Session, A. D. 1881.

Senate joint resolution No. 31, concerning the taxation of banks.

Whereas the General Government was under the necessity of imposing heavy and burdensome taxes on all of the industries of the country which were cheerfully paid by the loyal people of the nation in order that the national life might be preserved; and

Whereas the revenues of the General Government have been so large that more than one-third of the national debt has been liquidated since the close of the war, and are still largely in excess of its necessary expenditures; and

Whereas the General Government has long since taken off the taxes on nearly all of the industries of the country, but has not as yet afforded the slightest relief to the national banks; and

Whereas the effect of this enormous taxation has caused many of them to fail and has driven large amounts of bank capital into other channels of investment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the time has fully come for the Congress of the United States to relieve the national banks and the savings banks of the country from the heavy burdens that are now too great to bear.

Resolved further, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to do all in their power to procure such legislation in Congress as will afford the necessary relief.

Resolved further, That the secretary of State send a certified copy of the above resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Passed the senate February 10, 1881.
Passed the house February 11, 1881.

Mr. JONAS presented resolutions of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange; which were read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE,
New Orleans, February 17, 1881.

At the last regular meeting of the board of directors of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas it is of paramount importance to the interests of the United States in general that a medium of communication should be had with the Pacific coast and the countries beyond shortening the distance by water, and affording proper competition for the transportation of all articles of commerce; and

"Whereas the proposed ship-railway across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, authorized under grant from the Mexican Government to James B. Eads, appears to be the most feasible and likely of the earliest completion; and

"Whereas the character and past services of James B. Eads entitle him to the entire confidence of the people of the United States as an engineer and a man of genius and great executive ability: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That the New Orleans Cotton Exchange indorses the plan of James B. Eads for building a ship-canal across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and earnestly petitions Congress to aid him by its support, morally and financially, in carrying out his great enterprise.

"Resolved, That a copy of the above be sent to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with request for their hearty co-operation."

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Legislature of Illinois has passed certain joint resolutions relating to General Grant. I ask that they be read and referred.

The Secretary read as follows:

House joint resolution No. 19.

Whereas the people of the State of Illinois feel a just pride in the illustrious career of the most distinguished citizen of this State, General Ulysses S. Grant, and regard with pleasure the meed of honor and admiration which has been bestowed upon him throughout the civilized world; and

Whereas his civil and military services have conspicuously tended to add to the luster and renown of this nation and will illumine the pages of history; and

Whereas services so marked and distinguished have been by all nations and in all ages accorded a special recognition by the national authority: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house of representatives, (the senate concurring herein, in behalf of the people of the State of Illinois,) That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives be requested to use all honorable means to secure the passage of a suitable law for the retirement of Ulysses S. Grant with the rank of General, and we commend the action of our Senators and Representatives who have favored the passage of such a law.

Resolved, That the secretary of State be, and is hereby, instructed to forward copies of these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

HORACE H. THOMAS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN M. HAMILTON,
President of the Senate.

Adopted by House of Representatives February 3, 1881.

W. B. TAYLOR,
Clerk.

Concurred in by Senate February 8, 1881.

JAMES H. PADDOCK,
Secretary.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I suppose the resolutions ought to be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. Then I move that the resolutions lie on the table and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING presented resolutions of the national convention of the Seamen's Union of North America, held at Cleveland, Ohio, favoring the enactment of a law compelling all vessels to carry a proper number of competent seamen, to be regulated by the tonnage of the vessel; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the coal companies, railroads, and shippers of New York City, praying for an appropriation for the improvement of Little Sodus Harbor, and that it be made a port of refuge; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of the New York East Conference of the Methodist Church, representing 260 ministers and 45,000 members, officially signed, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the State of New York, officially signed, representing 4,000 members, asking for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic beverages throughout our national domain; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Wallace Wells, of Brooklyn, New York, praying for an extension of his patent for an improvement in steam-engines; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. COKE presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas, favoring an appropriation for the improvement of the bars of Brazos de Santiago, Aransas, Sabine Pass, Passo Caballo, and the mouth of Brazos and Buffalo Bayou in the State of Texas; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MAXEY presented a resolution of the Legislature of Texas, favoring the passage of a bill granting permission to construct a railway and to obtain the right of way through the Indian Territory for the Saint Louis and San Francisco Railway Company; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1067) to quiet title of settlers on Des Moines River lands in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes, and have instructed me to report it back and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be indefinitely postponed. There is a written report. I ask that the report be printed and the bill go upon the Calendar. It is a majority report and not a unanimous one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. GARLAND. At the request of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD,] I ask that it go upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. ROLLINS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6324) to construe an act entitled "An act to relieve the churches of the District of Columbia and to clear the title of the trustees of such property," reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 7032) to amend the act incorporating the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railroad Company, reported it with amendments.

Mr. HARRIS. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report a bill and to ask for its consideration.

The bill (S. No. 2202) declaring inauguration day a legal holiday in the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title.

The bill was read the second time at length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object. I think we have enough legal holidays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made; and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 7117) authorizing the Washington and Chesapeake Railroad Company to extend its railroad into and within the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6659) to authorize the Southern Maryland Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 7031) to amend the charter of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes, to report it back with sundry amendments, and as amended recommend the passage of the bill. I am further instructed by the committee, as it interests nearly every State and Territory of the Union, and as it is necessary for it as amended to be passed early in order to go back to the House, otherwise it will not be passed at all, I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill, and will say that it seeks no legislation whatever save the establishment of post-routes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments proposed by the committee will be considered as agreed to as reached in the reading of the bill, unless objected to by some one.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. TELLER. As this is but a formal matter of reading I suggest that by unanimous consent we dispense with the reading of the bill. I do not think anybody desires to hear it read.

Mr. MAXEY. It contains no legislation, and seeks none except the establishment of post-routes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to dispensing with the reading of the bill? The Chair hears none; and the question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EDUCATIONAL REPORT.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 378) providing for the printing and distribution of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1880, to report it without amendment, with a favorable recommendation, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It provides that of the Report of the Commissioner of Education for 1880 there be printed 4,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 8,181 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 12,819 copies for distribution by the Commissioner.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HEREFORD asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2203) to set apart and donate certain funds to the States, Territories, and District of Columbia for educational purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HEREFORD. I ask that the bill lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator.

Mr. MCMILLAN asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2204) for the relief of John J. Salter; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLUMB asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2205) granting the right of way through a military reservation to a railroad company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. EATON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2206) granting a pension to Lemuel Adams; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2207) to authorize the preparation and publication of a classified, analytical, and descriptive catalogue of all Government publications from July 4, 1776, to March 4, 1881; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask leave, by request of the Temperance Alliance of the District of Columbia, representing all the temperance organizations and the churches of the city of Washington, to introduce a bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 2208) to secure local option to the citizens of the District of Columbia in regard to the sale or prohibition of sale of intoxicating liquors; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PADDOCK asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 164) relating to salaries of Government employés in the District of Columbia; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length, with a view to its present consideration.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That all employés of the Government in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, shall be paid for the 4th day of March (inauguration day) and the 30th day of May, 1881, (Decoration Day,) as for other days on which they perform labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It had better go over and be printed. It involves a large question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over, objection being made.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I may not be opposed to the resolution. I think probably in a modified form I should be in favor of it; but it is not necessary to pass it now.

Mr. PADDOCK subsequently said: After consultation with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations I desire to move that the resolution which I presented a short time ago and which was objected to by him shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with the request that that committee may report it at an early day.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask that the following resolution be adopted. I think there will be no objection to it:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives a copy of the engrossed bill (S. No. 1314) for the relief of Chester A. Arthur, collector of the port of New York, the same having passed the Senate March 3, 1880, and having been by the House of Representatives referred to the said committee June 5, 1880, said bill having been lost or mislaid since being so referred.

By some mistake the engrossed bill has been lost in the House and they ask that another engrossed bill may be furnished them for reference to the committee. I suppose there would be no objection to that.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. JABEZ BURCHARD.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. No. 543) for the relief of Jabez Burchard.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the morning business through?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has heard no other morning business offered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the consideration of the Calendar, pending which the Senator from Pennsylvania asks the Senate at this time to consider the bill he has named.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Calendar will not be laid aside for the consideration of any bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It can only be laid aside upon motion.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I will state to the Senate that when this bill was reached on the Calendar a week ago it was passed over without prejudice because of my absence.

Mr. McDONALD. It was passed over with the understanding that it should not be displaced.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. It is really the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then it will come up as soon as the Calendar is before the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Then why object?

Mr. INGALLS. Nobody does object to it.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 543) for the relief of Jabez Burchard. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to allow to Jabez Burchard, assistant engineer on the retired list of the United States Navy, an amount which, with payments heretofore made to him, will be equal to 75 per cent. of the sea pay of the grade or rank held by him at the date of his retirement by a naval board, to take effect from and after the date of his retirement by the naval board.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like the Senator from Pennsylvania to give some reason why there is necessity for granting this relief.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Let the report be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, April 28, 1880:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 543) for the relief of Jabez Burchard, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The bill provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to allow to Jabez Burchard, assistant engineer on the retired list of the United States Navy, an amount which, with payments heretofore made to him, will be equal to 75 per cent. of the sea pay of the grade or rank held by him at the date of his retirement by a naval board of the United States Navy, said amount to be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to take effect from and after the date of his retirement by said naval board.

Mr. Burchard entered the United States Navy March 14, 1865, as acting third assistant engineer. He served five months on the monitor Naubuc; was detached and ordered to the United States steamer Powhatan. He served a little over two years and six months on this steamer; was detached and granted one month's leave of absence, and was honorably discharged. He re-entered the Navy September 1, 1870, as second assistant engineer, and was ordered on special duty at League Island, Pennsylvania; detached from there January 11, 1872, and ordered to the United States monitor Terror, at Havana. While attached to this monitor at Key West, Florida, in July, 1872, he was taken with an affection of the eyes, was examined by a board of medical officers, condemned, and sent home. After remaining on sick-leave for nearly a year he reported as fit for duty, and was ordered to join the United States steamer Tuscarora, at San Francisco. After joining this ship he was again attacked with affection of the eyes and was again condemned by a medical survey and sent home. After his arrival home he placed himself under the treatment of Dr. P. D. Keyser, an eminent oculist, who pronounced his disease to be one of the worst forms of inflammation of the retina. While in this condition he was ordered before the retiring board at Washington, which board decided that he was unfit for duty by reason of disability which did not originate in the line of duty. This decision placed him on the retired list, with the rate of pay of $500 per annum. The report of the medical officers on the retiring board is as follows:

"NAVAL RETIRING BOARD,
"Washington, D. C., October 12, 1874.

"SIR: We have examined Jabez Burchard, assistant engineer United States Navy, and find him afflicted with chronic retinitis. He has been twice condemned by medical survey for disease of the eyes, and there is no evidence on record that his disability originated in the 'line of duty.' He is at present unfit for duty, and, in our opinion, is permanently incapacitated to perform the duties appropriate to his commission.

"Respectfully, &c.,

"GEORGE PECK,

"DAVID KINDLEBERGER,

"Commodore J. W. A. NICHOLSON,

Mr. Burchard asserts that when he appeared before the retiring board he was wholly unprepared with essential and necessary proof, such as a certificate from his family physician, who had known him from childhood, and other important testimony, to show that the disease did originate in the service, not deeming it necessary, but that he relied solely upon the merits of his case, which he supposed would be clearly evident from a simple statement of the plain facts of the same.

From a very careful and diligent examination of the papers in this case, your committee are of the opinion that the decision of the retiring board was erroneous and unjust, as will appear from the following certificates from Dr. P. D. Keyser, surgeon at Wills's Eye Hospital, Philadelphia, and Dr. William T. W. Dickeson, the family physician of Mr. Burchard, which show very conclusively that the disease with which he is unfortunately afflicted was contracted in the line of duty while in the service of the United States, and that it was not hereditary:

"Mr. Jabez Burchard, assistant engineer United States Navy, came to me in October, 1873, suffering from a severe attack of retinitis, which has assumed a chronic form.

"This affection of the eyes is the result of his duties on monitor service, the great heat and severe changes of light, &c. I can find no signs of any constitutional (acquired or congenital) disease.

"He has been under my treatment up to the present date, and is still and always will be incapacitated for any use of his eyes.

"In his present condition, from chronic retinitis, he is absolutely unable to use his eyes from the painfulness caused by this disease.

"Affirmed and subscribed before me the day and year above written.

"A. P. OTTEY,

From the following letter of the former Secretary of the Navy, Mr. ROBESON, to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, it will be seen that it was the opinion of the Navy Department that the disease was incident to the service:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT,
"Washington, March 1, 1877.

"SIR: Upon a full review of all the facts in the case of Assistant Engineer Jabez Burchard, United States Navy, the Department is of the opinion that the causes which incapacitated him for active duty were incident to the service, and that he should receive the higher rate of pay allowed to retired officers by section 1588 of the Revised Statutes.

"Very respectfully, &c.,

"GEO. M. ROBESON,
"Secretary of the Navy.

"Hon. S. J. W. TABOR,
"Fourth Auditor of the Treasury."

The following is a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Hon. A. A. Sargent, former chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, which gives a concise history of the whole subject:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT,
"March 14, 1878.

"SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date inquiring, on behalf of the Naval Committee of the Senate, what were the reasons for placing Second Assistant Engineer Jabez Burchard on the retired list on furlough pay, and why it is now desirable to change his status.

"January, 1874, Mr. Burchard was ordered before a retiring board, the finding of which was that he was affected with chronic inflammation of the retina and was consequently, at the time, unfit for duty, but 'not incapacitated within the meaning of the law.'

"In October, 1874, he was again ordered before the retiring board and found incapacitated for service, and that there was no evidence that the incapacity originated in the line of duty.

"The President concurred in opinion with the retiring board, and directed that Second Assistant Engineer Burchard be retired on 'furlough pay,' and he was so retired.

"In 1876, Mr. Burchard appealed to the Secretary of the Navy to examine into his case, which he regarded as one of peculiar hardship, and filed certain papers in support of his claim that his disease originated in the line of duty, and asked that the President be requested to nominate him for transfer from the furlough to the retired pay list.

"Copies of these papers are herewith inclosed. The Solicitor of the Navy, to whom these papers were referred, reported: 'The evidence is so strong to prove that Burchard's loss of eyesight was caused by exposure in the performance of duty that I respectfully advise that he be nominated for transfer from the furlough to the retired pay list.'

"No nomination for a transfer was made, but instead thereof the Secretary of the Navy, March 1, 1877, informed the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury that, upon a full review of the case of Mr. Burchard, he was of opinion that the causes which incapacitated him for active duty were incident to the service, and that he should receive the higher rate of pay allowed to retired officers under section 1588 of the Revised Statutes.

"It appears that this view was accepted by the Fourth Auditor, and that Mr. Burchard was paid for the time he had been on the retired list the difference between furlough pay and retired pay.

"On the 10th of January, 1878, the Second Comptroller called on the Department for a copy of so much of the decision of the retiring board in Mr. Burchard's case as related to the question whether or not the causes were incident to the service, and, it is understood, decided, quite properly it is thought, that Mr. Burchard could only receive the higher pay by transfer, under section 1588 of the Revised Statutes, and gave directions to check against him the difference of pay he had received.

"As he was getting only 'furlough pay,' or half of 'leave of absence pay'—$500 a year—the checkage of this difference, which he had received, against this small sum of $500 per annum, was a peculiar hardship. Mr. Burchard therefore applied to the Department for a recommendation to the President for his nomination from the furlough to the retired pay list.

"Under all the circumstances—that is, the probability that Mr. Burchard's disease might have been incident to the service; that the Secretary of the Navy had given him the benefit of this view; that he had received the difference of pay; that a checkage against his small pay of $500 per annum would be peculiarly hard; that he is nearly blind, and was not charged with nor retired for immoral conduct—I consider the case as one calling for my favorable action, and his name was submitted to the President for nomination from the furlough pay to the retired pay list.

"A copy of the report of the medical officers on the retiring board is herewith inclosed; also a copy of a statement made by Burchard before the board.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"R. W. THOMPSON,
"Secretary of the Navy.

"Hon. A. A. SARGENT,
"Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate."

Mr. Burchard was subsequently nominated for the retired list of the Navy, so that he could lawfully receive 75 per cent. of sea pay, and he was confirmed by the Senate. He was accordingly transferred from the furlough to the retired list April 1, 1878, to take effect from the date of his retirement, October 26, 1876. The Comptroller, however, still adhered to his former decision that Mr. Burchard could not receive that rate of pay without a special law of Congress allowing the same. Hence this bill.

A bill for the relief of Mr. Burchard was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress on the very last day of the session, but failed to receive the final action of that body for want of time. The report submitted by Mr. Frank Jones, on behalf of the committee, at that time, shows that that committee held the same views in relation to the justice of the bill that your committee do. The report is as follows:

Mr. Frank Jones, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. No. 5642.

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5642) for the relief of Jabez Burchard, assistant engineer on the retired list of the United States Navy, having made diligent inquiry in reference to the merits of this bill, respectfully report:

"It appears from evidence furnished from the Navy Department that Assistant Engineer Burchard was retired in October, 1874, on account of defective vision, incapacitating him for active duty, and that a board of officers reported that his disability resulted from injuries received not in the line of duty; he was consequently placed upon furlough pay. In 1876 he appealed to the Secretary of the Navy for a re-examination of his case, and furnished evidence in support of his claim, that his disease resulted from injuries received in the line of his duty. The evidence was so strong in support of the fact that Mr. Burchard lost his eyesight by exposure in the performance of his duty that the Secretary considered it just that he should be transferred from furlough to the retired list of the Navy, and he ordered the accounting officer of the Treasury to allow him 75 per cent. of the sea pay of his grade, which he was accordingly paid. But a new Comptroller coming into office, ruled, under the opinion given by the Attorney-General, that having been retired by a report of a board of officers, stating that his disability was not the result of injuries incurred in line of duty, he was entitled to but 50 per cent. of sea pay. Afterward Secretary Thompson, with a view to give him 75 per cent. of sea pay, recommended that he be nominated for the retired list of the Navy, and the President so nominated him; and after an examination of all the papers in connection with the case the Senate confirmed the nomination. He was accordingly put on the retired-pay list of the Navy. But the Comptroller still decided that such nomination and confirmation could not give him the 75 per cent. of sea pay without an act of Congress and in this decision he was sustained by the Attorney-General. There was therefore no recourse left Mr. Burchard but to appeal to Congress. In his letter to the chairman of the Senate Naval Committee, Secretary Thompson said: 'Under all the circumstances, and considering the probability that Mr. Burchard's disease might have been incident to the service; that the Secretary of the Navy had given him the benefit of this view, and that he had received the difference of pay; that a checkage against his small pay of $500 per annum would be peculiarly hard; that he is nearly blind, and was not charged with or retired for immoral conduct, I consider the case as calling for my favorable action, and his name was submitted to the President for transfer from furlough pay to the retired pay list.'

"Considering all the facts and circumstances in connection with this case, the committee report favorably thereon, and recommend that the bill ought to pass."

Mr. Burchard is entirely incapacitated from pursuing any avocation that requires the use of his eyes, and is therefore debarred from the pursuit of any occupation by which he might earn a sufficient income for his support.

Should the bill recommended by your committee pass, Mr. Burchard will receive pay at the rate of $1,275 per annum, or 75 per cent. of the sea pay of his grade, his pay at present being $850 per annum, or 50 per cent. of the sea pay of his grade.

The following statement is incorporated in this report for the information of the Senate, which shows the rate at which Mr. Burchard has been paid since his retirement:

Jabez Burchard retired October 26, 1874, and paid as follows:

N. B.—This officer received the pay at $1,275, or 75 per cent. of the sea pay at $1,700 per annum from date of retirement, October 26, 1874, to March 31, 1878. April 1, 1878, it was changed to 50 per cent. of $1,700, ($850,) and he is so paid to December 31, 1879, last return in.

Your committee are of opinion that this is a very meritorious case, and one that appeals to the magnanimity and justice of Congress.

The bill is therefore reported favorably, and its passage is earnestly recommended.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ANNIE E. GARDNER.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the order of the Senate accepting the adverse report of the Committee on Pensions which was made on the 11th of February may be reconsidered and the matter placed upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator please give the number of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. It is the petition of Annie E. Gardner, widow of John W. Gardner, praying for a pension.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition is not on the Calendar. Does the Senator ask that the case be recommitted?

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the vote of the Senate accepting the report and indefinitely postponing, if that was the vote, or denying the petition——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Denying the petition.

Mr. HOAR. Be reconsidered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And that the papers be recommitted?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be entered.

MISSOURI RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. SAUNDERS. On Saturday last I presented a resolution on the subject of instructing the Committee on Commerce in relation to the river and harbor bill, which I should like to have called up.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution submitted by Mr. SAUNDERS February 19, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be directed to amend the river and harbor bill so as to increase the amount to be appropriated for the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri River between its mouth and Yankton, Dakota, to the sum of $1,138,000, that being the sum recommended by the Chief Engineer of the War Department as necessary to be expended for the improvement of the navigation of that part of said river during the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1882.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President——

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope there will be better order in the Chamber, so that my colleague may be heard on this important question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Order must be preserved.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. President, the question may be asked why the resolution does not include the whole length of the Missouri River. My reply is that the resolution is designed to cover only that part of the river which has heretofore been surveyed and on which estimates of the cost have been reported. The other part I leave for future consideration.

The river and harbor bill comes to the Senate from the House of Representatives with an unusually large sum of money proposed to be appropriated to the various rivers and harbors in the United States; but I am not so much surprised at the amount proposed, for I am well aware of the increased demand for water facilities to aid in moving the productions of this vast country, as I am at the discriminations made in parceling out this sum.

While some portions of the country seem to be bountifully provided for, others of equal claims for aid in improving their navigable waters seem to have been almost entirely overlooked; none perhaps more so than the Missouri River, a stream which furnishes the largest and richest valley of agricultural lands of any valley in the United States. I take pleasure here, and before entering upon the merits of this important subject, to acknowledge my indebtedness to the report made a few years ago by a Committee of the Senate on Transportation to the Seaboard for many of the facts and figures connected with the subject. One thing, however, seemed to have escaped the attention of that committee, namely, that improvements were necessary to put the Missouri River in navigable order. The committee, however, are excusable to some extent from the fact that a large portion of the settlers along the valley of that river have located there since the report was made.

I am favorable to a liberal appropriation of money to improve the navigation of the great arteries of commerce, such as the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, and for the improvement of the harbors on the lakes and seaboard; but in making these appropriations Congress should not fail to take into consideration, before fixing the amounts to be appropriated, the necessity for the improvement to be made and the number of people to be served by the improvement. If a sufficient sum of money was appropriated to insure the opening and keeping open a channel in the Missouri, say within the bounds I have named in the resolution, that is, between its mouth and Vermillion, Dakota, or even to Sioux City, in Iowa, I would then feel inclined to invite the grain-growers of that region of country to the propriety of preparing to do their own shipping of their surplus grain and breadstuffs, and this could be done if the Missouri River were kept in anything like reasonable condition, at much cheaper rates to the shipper than is now paid over the established lines. With the Missouri River put in suitable condition for shipments during the summer and fall seasons of the year, companies would soon be organized, or neighbors would in other ways combine their surplus capital and barge lines be established, whereby this great river and the Mississippi could be used so as to save millions of dollars every year to the farming people of the new Northwest. As before said, more than 3,000,000 people are dependent upon a few lines of railroad or upon this part of the Missouri River for an outlet for their surplus produce, and yet the paltry sum of $194,000 is all that is proposed by this House bill to accomplish this great work.

Mr. President, I should not be doing justice to myself or the people I have the honor in part to represent if I were to let this bill pass in its present shape without entering my solemn protest and at least making an effort to amend it, and I call upon the Senate committee to aid in correcting this wrong; and this can only be done by increasing the amount to be appropriated for the work alluded to to a sum that shall be commensurate with the great object to be attained. The railroad rates from the Missouri River to the seaboard are such as to leave too little for the producer, and hence the necessity of devising means for transporting at least the grain and breadstuffs to market at less rates than are now paid, and in no other way can this be done, in my opinion, than by keeping open as long as possible each year the great river thoroughfares.

I may be asked if the railroads cannot transport the grain of the West to the eastern seaboard as cheaply as to send it by steam all the way around by New Orleans? To this I reply that they do not do it; and indeed I do not think they try to do so. It is highly probable that if the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers were properly improved that railroad managers would be compelled to lower their rates of transportation, and if so even that would be a good reason for spending a little money in improving the rivers.

The question of regulating by law interstate commerce is a difficult matter to settle. That such a thing can constitutionally be done, and that it should be done, I have no doubt, but in what way the question can be settled so as to give equal rights to the people near the seaboard and those in the interior or in the extreme West is a subject that is now being thoroughly canvassed by gentlemen who are well prepared to do the subject full and ample justice.

A few suggestions on some of the questions that will naturally suggest themselves to those having charge of this work may not be out of order here. First, the practice now very common of making special rates for favorites and of granting drawbacks, &c., should be put a stop to, for, the roads being common carriers, should deal with all its patrons alike. Then again, the practice now in vogue of two or more companies combining or pooling their earnings is another pernicious practice which is calculated to destroy all the advantages that the people had a right to expect from what they had good reason for supposing would make a reasonable and healthy competition.

Another subject is worthy of serious consideration, and that is whether the railroad companies should be permitted to make such discrimination in charges as are now practiced; that is, whether a less amount shall be charged for a longer than for a shorter distance. This subject is at least worthy of consideration, and I trust we may ere long hear from the Committee on Railroads on this subject.

That railroads and especially the trunk lines can carry freight or passengers or both at less rates than is done at the present, is proved by the fact that the officers at the head of these lines almost invariably become millionaires within a few years after taking charge. A portion of this money ought to have been turned into the hands of the producers.

Our Government has done much to encourage and foster railroad enterprises, and now it seems to me it owes it to citizens who are interested, to do something more than has been done toward improving the navigable waters, and thus giving free access to the seaboard. I desire to call attention to the following table relating to the railroads in the United States, and particularly to that part which relates to the subsidized railroads, and will ask if in the opinion of the Senate it would be considered out of order to ask the small sum that this resolution calls for to improve the navigation of the lower portion of the Missouri River. I will not trouble the Senate by alluding to any others at this time except those which have received grants from the General Government. It may be proper here to state that the Senator, [Mr. COCKRELL,] to whom I am indebted for the tabulated statement here given, was at the time he presented it to the Senate, advocating a bill which proposed to appropriate funds with which to make a survey of the Mississippi River for its full length, and I might with propriety here add that the same should be applied to the Missouri River; but I will content myself at this time by simply asking for the amount already estimated by the War Department, to be used in improving some of the most difficult parts of the river, running through the States I have alluded to—that is, in Nebraska, Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas.

Thus to secure the completion of 13,722½ miles of railways the Government has actually granted in lands and bonds the enormous sum of $139,203,585.32, being $10,144.22 per mile for each mile built. If we take it for granted that by the recent sinking-fund act the Government shall be fully indemnified for the bonds granted and interest paid, and only estimate the land grants, then we have 38,052,530 acres of land actually given to secure 13,722½ miles of railroads; and estimating the lands at $1.25 per acre they amount to $47,565,662, or $3,466.25 per mile, not estimating the 183,216,133 acres covered by the grants but not yet certified or patented. Suppose, when all the roads projected under Government aid are completed, that they, with the roads already completed, shall make 17,500 miles, and 100,000,000 acres of land only shall be patented, then we will have 17,500 miles of railway aided by the Government with lands to the quantity of 138,052,530 acres, amounting, at $1.25 per acre, to $172,565,662, not counting the bonds given, being $9,860.89 per mile.

These railroads, when completed, belonged to corporations and charged freight for everything transported upon them. They are not natural highways, but they belong to corporations and to individuals, and they charge the Government for what it freights upon them. Now let us look at this Mississippi River and its tributaries. The Mississippi River and its tributaries have 16,674 miles of waterway navigable by steam-vessels, as shown by the following statement:

Waters of Mississippi River and tributaries navigable by steam-vessels, as estimated by a Government topographical engineer.

	Miles.
Mississippi River and branches proper, navigable	7,097
Ohio and branches, navigable	3,292
Missouri and branches, navigable	2,655
Red River and branches, navigable	3,630
Total miles of navigable waters of Mississippi and tributaries	16,674

These navigable waters extend into and can furnish transportation for the products of the States of Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebrasks, Kansas, and Missouri, eighteen States, and the Territories known as Indian Territory, Dakota, and Montana, three Territories; and in addition to these eighteen States and three Territories which have navigable tributaries within their borders waters from the States of New York, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, and Colorado, and the Territories of New Mexico and Wyoming flow into these navigable tributaries. The area thus drained is 1,237,311 square miles, amounting to 791,879,040 acres of land.

Here are 16,674 miles of navigable river. If we give to these miles of navigable river the same amount which the Government has given to railroads, what will be the difference? These rivers will be open to the navigation of everybody free. The Government, upon its vessels, can transport free, and every individual can do the same. They will become national highways, inland seas.

We are not asking $9,860 per mile. We are not even asking $900 per mile, one-tenth part of what the railroads have received, in order to open up 16,674 miles of navigable water. Austria has spent more for the improvement of the Danube alone than the United States has spent for the improvement of the Mississippi River and all its tributaries.

Who, after looking at these munificent donations or subsidies made by the General Government to aid in building up these great lines of railroads, would hesitate to approve of a reasonable appropriation to be used in clearing out the obstacles that stand in the way of a free and easy navigation of our great rivers? To show how the wants of the upper Missouri Valley have been overlooked by those who prepared the river and harbor bill which is now in the hands of the Senate committee, it is only necessary to say that for the 2,500 miles of said river there is proposed the sum of $194,000. It is safe to say that no less than 3,000,000 people are now living on said river and its principal tributaries, and that fully 1,000,000 of these live in Iowa, Nebraska, and in the northwest part of Missouri; and the sum proposed for this part of the river is only $52,000, whereas the estimated amount required for this work, as made by the War Department, is $551,000.

Now, if the Government would appropriate even one-tenth part for the rivers of the Mississippi Valley that has been given to the railroads, I believe it would have the effect of saving millions of dollars to the people in the way of cheapened transportation.

Another thing is worthy of consideration by the people of the Northwest, and that is that by the improvement of these rivers and the consequent cheap transportation of their surplus products, a new trade could be opened up to them, which would prove not only profitable to them, but also of great advantage to the purchasers of their products.

The States of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas constitute beyond doubt the largest and most valuable cotton-growing area on the surface of the globe. The soil and climate of a large part of these States are, however, unfavorable to the profitable culture of cereals. The States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Arkansas, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, and Kansas, on the other hand, embrace the most extensive and by far the richest grain-producing area in the world. Owing to the cost of transport of the cereals of the West to the South Atlantic and Gulf States, the demand for breadstuffs causes thousands of acres of land to be diverted to the unprofitable culture of wheat and corn where cotton might be much more profitably cultivated if cheap breadstuffs could be procured elsewhere. With cheap and direct transportation provided between the grain States and the cotton States the interests both of the producers of cotton and of grain would be subserved.

This saving in the cost of transportation would accrue to producer and consumer alike. The distance from the center of the grain-producing area in the Western States to England is about four thousand five hundred miles, and the distance from the central line production of the grain-producing States to the central line of the cotton belt is about eight hundred miles. If the entire quantity of grain now shipped to great Britain could be sent to the cotton States, and the withdrawal of our foreign exports of grain be supplemented by an increased exportation of cotton, a vast saving would be effected in the aggregate cost of transporting these two products from the producer to the consumer. But there would be no necessity for withdrawing any shipments to Europe in order to supply this southern demand, for the great grain fields of the Northwest are already capable of supplying both markets.

Only a few years ago such a thing as shipping beef-cattle from our western plains to European markets was not so much as thought of. Now we are shipping large quantities, and the business is increasing daily. This trade brings with it additional demands for our corn in that market; for it is found that corn as food to prepare the cattle for market after arriving in that country is not only the best but the cheapest food that can be purchased. It is also now greatly used in England in distilling, starch-making, and in feeding hogs as well as horses and cattle. The lower it can be shipped and put upon the market the greater will be the consumption, and the greater the demand upon the producer for supply.

Five or six years ago the consumption of corn in England was said to be about fifty million bushels; to-day it is nearly or quite one hundred million bushels, and with lower prices, which could be effected if cheaper transportation could be had, the consumption could be more than doubled. Alluding again to the barge lines that could be put upon these rivers, in case of improvement in the navigation, parties who are well acquainted with that line of business say that one tug-boat will be sufficient power to transport five of the ordinary-sized barges, which would contain twenty thousand bushels each, or one hundred thousand in the aggregate; and if the larger size barges be used, say those of ten hundred or twelve hundred tons burden, then one tug would manage three of these having a capacity of at least as much as the five smaller ones. So that it is safe to say that one steam-tug could easily convey to the mouth of the Mississippi one hundred thousand bushels of wheat or corn. Other lines of barges could be started for the purpose of shipping to the seaboard the cattle destined for foreign markets. It would, I think, be apparent to any one that cattle shipped in this way would be in much better condition when conveyed by these comparatively easy lines than when shaken and bruised and fevered by the rough treatment inseparable at present from railroad transit. The fact is there is no transportation known to the busy world that will compare for cheapness with down-stream water navigation. The Almighty made these great thoroughfares for the use of the people. No monopolies can take possession of them and occupy them to the exclusion of others who may want to use them. They may therefore be truly called the "people's highway."

But, Mr. President, I have already detained the Senate too long, particularly when we are so near the close of the session; but the importance of the subject to the people I have the honor in part to represent is my excuse for this detention. I hope the committee will see the importance of so amending the bill as to meet the recommendations of the War Department, and thus save, rather than throw away, money; for the amount reported in the bill would not, in my opinion, secure the work which will be necessary to insure certain and safe navigation of that part of the river. The cheapest shipment of freights for the same length of road in any State in the Union is in the State of New York. And why? It is because its railroads have to come into competition with navigation both on its northern boundary and by the Erie Canal and the Hudson River. If we can improve our rivers and cheapen the rates to the seaboard by water we will very soon see the same effect on railroads in the West and South that we now see on eastern lines which come into competition with the lakes, rivers, and canals.

Mr. President, I now move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Commerce for its consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' HOMESTEAD LOCATIONS.

Mr. WITHERS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The Senator from Virginia calls for the regular order. The first case on the Calendar at the point where it was last reached will be laid before the Senate.

The bill (S. No. 858) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees and commissions paid on void entries of public lands, was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

Mr. MORGAN. I am in favor of the passage of the bill, and desire it passed very much, but I wish to offer an amendment which I think will not embarrass the bill in the slightest degree, and on the amendment I wish to submit a few observations, and then if the Senator who has charge of the bill thinks the amendment is calculated to embarrass the bill, I shall be inclined to withdraw it; but I think it will not have that effect. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama submits an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add as a new section the following:

That coal lands within the State of Alabama shall be subject to disposal as agricultural lands, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, as I must confine my remarks within the space of five minutes, I will occupy that time in a simple statement of facts. The act of 1873, which my amendment declares inapplicable to Alabama, excludes coal lands from entry and from homestead settlement except upon the payment of $10 per acre when they are more than fifteen miles from a railroad, and $20 per acre when they are within that distance from a railroad.

The inconvenience and injustice of this law was so severely felt in the States that have in them large areas of public lands inviting settlement, that Congress has by special statutes excepted Missouri and Kansas from its operation, as well as several other States. All I ask is an equal chance for Alabama to grow in population and wealth. These States needed population and the people needed coal, and Congress justly refused to shut them out from those lands. Do not throttle Alabama while you set other States at liberty to grow and prosper. I read a letter addressed to me by Captain F. Winter, the geologist of the General Land Office, showing the state of the case as it relates to Alabama:

UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1881.

SIR: Referring to our to-day's conversation I have the honor to inform you that the coal lands in the State of Alabama contain 1,537,280 acres. Of this amount I reported about one-third as really valuable coal lands, the remainder as of no value whatsoever. Notwithstanding, the whole amount was withdrawn from public sale, and can only be bought under the coal land act of March 3, 1873. The iron-ore lands withdrawn from public sale contain 224,000 acres.

I further inclose copies of an extract of the Land Commissioner's report from which I hope you will gain all necessary information. The data were all furnished by me.

Wishing you all success in the noble enterprise to free your State from said mineral plague,

I remain, sir, very respectfully,

F. WINTER.

Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senate.

I read further from the same authority the following lists, showing that in all the States and Territories the number of acres of coal land withdrawn from sale under the act of March 3, 1873, is 1,683,280 acres, of which Alabama supplies 1,537,280 acres, leaving only 146,000 acres withdrawn in the other States and Territories. This is an extraordinary burden to place on one State, and is of incalculable injury to the country. Its magnitude will be apparent in outline when it is understood that Alabama has the nearest coal field to the Gulf of Mexico, and that the Alabama and Tennessee Rivers flow at the base of the coal measures to bear the coal to the Gulf; and four great lines of railways run through or near these coal fields. That iron, limestone, sandstone of the best quality for furnace purposes, fire clay, kaolin, and vast virgin forests of the finest timber abound in this region, which is intersected by streams that afford an unequaled water power, and that these lands afford marked advantages to agricultural settlement to men of limited means. It is what is aptly and expressively called a good poor-man's country. Can it be that Congress will lock out these people and all others from this great source of commerce at the very moment when they have at great cost built lines of railroads to this extraordinary deposit of wealth?

The act of March 3, 1873, has been in force for eight years, and during that time only 11,359 acres of coal land have been sold under it in all the public domain, as is set forth in the following list, which I will read:

COAL LANDS.

Prior to 1864 coal lands were not specifically noted for reservation or sale, but were disposed of as other public lands under settlement or other laws, until the passage of the pre-emption act of 1841.

The act of Congress of July 1, 1864, for the disposal of coal lands and town property on the public domain, authorized the sale of the coal lands which had been excluded from sale as mines by the pre-emption act of 1841. Under this act they became subject to pre-emption at the minimum of $20 per acre after offering under proclamation of the President at public sale to the highest bidder in suitable legal subdivisions.

March 3, 1865, an act was passed by Congress supplemental to the act of July 1, 1864, giving citizens of the United States who were engaged in coal mining for commerce the right to enter at the proper district land office one hundred and sixty acres of land or less at $20 per acre.

The act of March 3, 1873, gave a pre-emption right of one hundred and sixty acres of coal land to a person, and three hundred and twenty acres to an association, upon payment of not less than $10 per acre, where the lands lie not more than fifteen miles from a completed railroad, and $20 per acre where the lands lie within fifteen miles of such road; and further provided that when any association of not less than four persons have expended $5,000 in working and improving any mine, located within limits as above, they may make an additional entry of six hundred and forty acres at the several limit prices. (See sections 2347–2352 R. S.; Regulations of General Land Office, April 15, 1880.)

The rectangular system of surveys is extended over coal lands, and they are sold in conformity with the legal subdivisions thereof.

The method of designation or classification, by noting character of land in field notes by deputy surveyor, and marking on plats, when known, or of proof at the district land office prior to time of filing, is similar to the method of segregation under the mineral act, and is given in detail in the Regulations of the General Land Office, April 15, 1880.

ENTRIES UNDER THE COAL-LAND ACTS.

From 1866 to June 30, 1880, under the coal-land acts there have been 78 entries at district land offices, containing 10,750.24 acres, for which the United States received $146,999.25, as follows:

COAL LANDS.

The public lands of the United States containing coal are disposed of under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1873.

The sale of coal lands is provided for by this act—

1. By ordinary private entry under section 1.

2. By granting a preference right of purchase based on priority of possession and improvement under section 2.

The land entered under either section must be by legal subdivisions, as made by the regular United States survey. Entry is confined to surveyed lands; to such as are vacant, not otherwise appropriated, reserved by competent authority, or containing valuable minerals other than coal.

Individuals and associations may purchase. If an individual, he must be twenty-one years of age and a citizen of the United States, or have declared his intention to become such citizen.

If an association or persons, each must be qualified as above.

A person is not disqualified by the ownership of any quantity of other land, nor by having removed from his own land in the same State or Territory.

Any individual may enter by legal subdivision as aforesaid any area not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres.

Any association may enter not to exceed three hundred and twenty acres.

Any association of not less than four persons, duly qualified, who shall have expended not less than $5,000 in working and improving any coal mine or mines, may enter under section 2 not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, including such mining improvements.

The price per acre is $10 where the land is situated more than fifteen miles from any completed railroad, and $20 per acre where the land is within fifteen miles of such road.

Where the land lies partly within fifteen miles of such road and in part outside such limit, the maximum price must be paid for all legal subdivisions the greater part of which lies within fifteen miles of such road.

The term "completed railroad" is held to mean one which is actually constructed on the face of the earth, and the lands within fifteen miles of any point of a railroad so constructed will be held and disposed of at $20 per acre.

One year from and after the expiration of the period allowed for filing the declaratory statement is given within which to make proof and payment, but no party will be allowed to make final proof and payment, except on notice to all others who appear on the records as claimants to the same tracts.

The amount of money received from the sale of coal lands in eight years has been $146,999.25. Contrast this beggarly account with the fact that in eight years under the graduation law of August, 1854, 25,696,419 acres of lands were sold, and we have an idea of the disastrous effects produced upon the masses of this people, the landless thousands of home seekers, by excluding them from an area of 8,639 square miles, nearly one-fifth of the State of Alabama, by pricing up coal lands to $10 and $20 per acre. The act of 1873 has these evils in its train:

1. It shuts out the poorer classes from the opportunity to acquire coal lands.

2. It reserves the coal lands for the exclusive use of capitalists, until they get ready to buy them.

3. It gives to the land-grant railroads, at least in Alabama, a monopoly in coal, found in large bodies on lands donated to them by the United States.

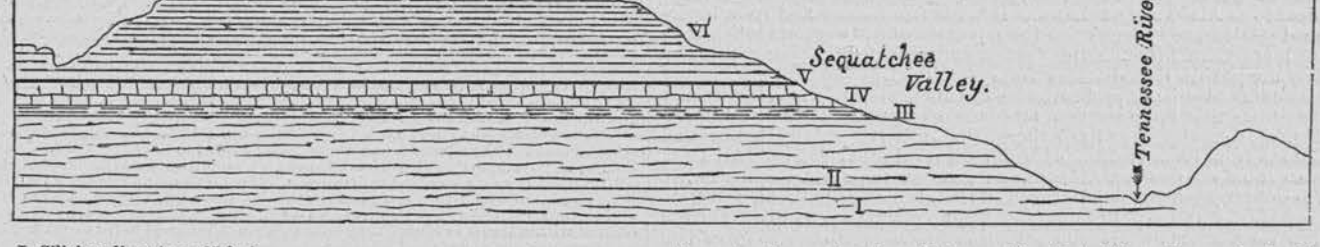
4. It shuts out soldiers from all opportunity to take up coal lands with their land warrants.

5. In Alabama it virtually locks out every man from access to the public lands in an area of one million and a half acres who is not able to pay $10 to $20 per acre for his homestead or entry.

6. It condemns the richest area of coal land in the United States to remain a wilderness for one hundred years to come.

In proof of its value and of the necessity of opening this great body of land to settlement, I will read the following statements made by Captain Winter in his official reports to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, by whose direction he made an official examination of these lands:

REPORT ON THE PUBLIC LANDS IN THE STATE OF ALABAMA CONTAINING COAL AND OTHER MINERALS.



UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE,
Huntsville, Alabama, February 1, 1879.

Having been deputed by letter of the 28th December last as special agent under the fifth subdivision of section 2223 Revised Statutes of the United States to examine and to report on the mineral character of certain lands in the State of Alabama, I left Washington on the 16th ultimo and arrived at Huntsville on the 18th. After paying a visit to the officers of the local land office at that place, by whom I was most kindly received, I proceeded to the coal region on the Warrior River, in Jefferson County, for the purpose of getting a clear idea of the topography of the whole coal region in general and of the order of the different formations and coal veins in particular. For some years the most extensive mining operations have been conducted there, and shafts have been sunk to the depth of several hundred feet.

After examining carefully the shafts at Warrior and Morris stations and at the Jefferson mines, and traversing the country for several miles in an easterly and westerly direction, I gathered sufficient information to determine the margins of the coal-fields, to calculate the area of the same, and to enable myself to report with correctness as to the number, thickness, and altitude of the different coal-beds.

Prepared in this way for the task before me, I returned to Huntsville and proceeded from there to Larkinsville, on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, to begin my survey with the coal region of Jackson County. The map submitted by Mr. Hiram Haines, of Birmingham, does not contain any mineral lands of said county. From the topography of the country which I had traversed in the railroad cars, I could plainly discern that the lands lay in the coal measures, and as I had reason to suspect that the omission was not accidental, I thought it advisable to include Jackson County in my survey, and as I believe with the best result.

The Cumberland Mountain of Tennessee sends out in a southerly direction many finger-like spurs or prongs across the Alabama line, which are very often severed by gaps and covers, leaving many outlying detached mountains belonging to the coal measures. The coal-fields of said mountain are cut into two arms by the Sequatchee Valley and its continuation. The fields in question are situated on the west side of this valley. The following section was made through the middle of Jackson County from east to west:

I. Silicious limestone, 95 feet.
II. Mountain limestone, 505 feet.
III. Shaly sandstones, 17 feet.
IV. Heavy bedded sandstones, 23 feet.
V. Fireclay and coal, 1. 3 feet.
VI. Shales and sandstones with probably one seam of coal, 190 feet.
VII and VIII. Fireclay and coal, 4 feet each, 8 feet.
IX. Cliff rock, 75 feet.

The first coal-seam occurs about forty feet above the mountain limestone; it is from eighteen inches to two feet thick, and when found in workable thickness will furnish an excellent article. One hundred and ninety-four feet above this seam is the next coal-seam, showing a thickness of four feet. The coal is very hard, cubical, laminar, semi-lustrous, free from sulphur, and has no superior as a shipping coal in Alabama or any other State. In the seam is a parting of fire-clay two inches thick, occurring thirty-five inches from the roof and remaining parallel with it. This band of fire-clay, so far from being a disadvantage, is of great value in the economical production of the coal. The same being of a soft consistency, is easily picked out, and the upper and lower layers of coal are broken off by wedges driven in at the top of the roof and from the bottom. In this way the use of blasting-powder is rendered unnecessary.

Various openings have been made, and four miles above Boyt's Switch a gangway was driven to the distance of one hundred and fifty feet through the coal.

On the westerly margin above Guess Creek the outcrop is exposed to view under the cliff-rock for several miles, everywhere showing a thickness of four feet.

The close proximity to the Memphis and Charleston Railroad makes this coal-field one of the most important in the State of Alabama, and, as the Tennessee River is within easy reach, will be able to compete with any of the more northern coal-fields as soon as the projected improvements of the Muscle Shoals in that river shall be completed. Appendix A contains the public lands in Jackson County, in which the four-feet coal-vein occurs; and Appendix B is a rather hurriedly composed sketch showing the outlines of the whole coal-field in said county.

Respectfully submitted.

REPORT ON THE MINERAL LANDS IN THE STATE OF ALABAMA.

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., March 11, 1879.

In pursuance of the plan adopted by me to begin with the most northerly part of the mineral lands of Alabama and to proceed in a southerly direction, the field works of the survey during the last month have been devoted chiefly to the coal formations in Marshall and Blount Counties.

The structure of the entire coal-field is a long synclinal, occasioned by two anticlinals on each side of it, the one on the west forming Sequatchee and the other on the east forming Murphrees Valley. The synclinal itself is again divided in Blount County by the principal branch of the Black Warrior River, as will be seen in the following section, through townships 13 of ranges 1 and 2 east and 1 and 2 west, from an easterly to a westerly direction:

I. Knox shale and dolomite.
II. Chazy and Trenton.
III. Dyestone group with beds of fossiliferous red-iron ore.
IV. Black shale.
V. Mountain limestone.
VI. Conglomerate.
VII. Coal measures proper.

Going southwest from Guntersville a coal-bed is exposed on Short and Drum Creeks, showing a thickness of twenty-eight inches, and lying under or rather in the conglomerate. This bed, like several others belonging to the upper coal measures, is opened for domestic and blacksmith purposes at several places, but all are very irregular in thickness. They are most frequently too thin to work with profit, but where they swell out to a thickness of three feet or more, they might become valuable.

The Dyestone group is exposed along the easterly slope of Red Mountain, in Murphrees Valley, and shows the fossiliferous red iron-ore at several places in workable thickness. At the corresponding position in Sequatchee Valley no well defined exposure of the red ore of this group was observed, though a sandstone having many of the characteristics of the dyestone sandstones is seen in the creek near the S. & N. R. R., between Bangor and Blount Springs. The coal measures, hereinbefore described, are bounded on the east by the Sand Mountain, formed of the steep rocks of the conglomerate, and on the west by the high cliffs of the same formation. Parallel with the same run the South and North Railroad, through Sequatchee Valley, and the Chattanooga and Alabama Railroad, through Jones Valley. There are no suitable gaps through which a connection with any one of said railroads could be effected. The value, therefore, of said coal-lands will appear very problematical. They all are situated within fifteen miles of any of the railroads; but the price of $20 per acre will, in my opinion, never be realized.

In Appendix A I give the public lands of Marshall and Blount Counties, in which coal-veins occur, as also some of the lands situated on Red Mountain, in which the fossiliferous red iron-ore was found.

Respectfully submitted.

F. WINTER,
Special Agent.

To Hon. J. A. WILLIAMSON,
Commissioner General Land Office, Washington, D. C.

Referring to my first report of February 1, 1879, I come next to the description of the coal lands of in Cherokee and De Kalb Counties. These mountains embrace the high table land between Sequatchee Valley on the west and Wills Valley on the east. The principal coal-vein occurs in the cliffrock or conglomerate, and the same as described in my last report. The vein belongs to the lower coal measures, the whole part of which is so much squeezed out between the two great anticlinal folds, the Sequatchee and Wills Valley, that only the two edges have been sufficiently elevated to form the high table land or plateau above mentioned, excluding the upper measures entirely, with the exception of some back benches, where no workable coal veins exist. The bed is from two and a half to three feet thick, and has been worked at several places along the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad. I examined the mine near Fort Payne, where the vein is two and a half feet thick, which appears to me to be the average thickness, although it rises sometimes to three feet and more, while on other places the coal is only very poorly represented, sinking down to the thickness of a few inches. At Short Creek, in Marshall County, I found the bed one and a half feet thick, and near Hendrick, in Blount County, two feet. The greater part of the openings were made for the purpose of obtaining a little coal for domestic use or blacksmith purposes. In the neighborhood of the Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad mines have been opened at several places. The Eureka mines, near Sulphur Spring Station, and the Hendrick mine, near Fort Payne, and the Harralson mines at Halloman's Station. Owing to the irregularity of the vein no extensive mining business has been done; the operations, on the contrary, have been suspended almost entirely. In view of which fact the public lands in this part of the State cannot be considered as containing valuable coal-beds.

The prolongation of this coal-field in a southwesterly direction leads to the

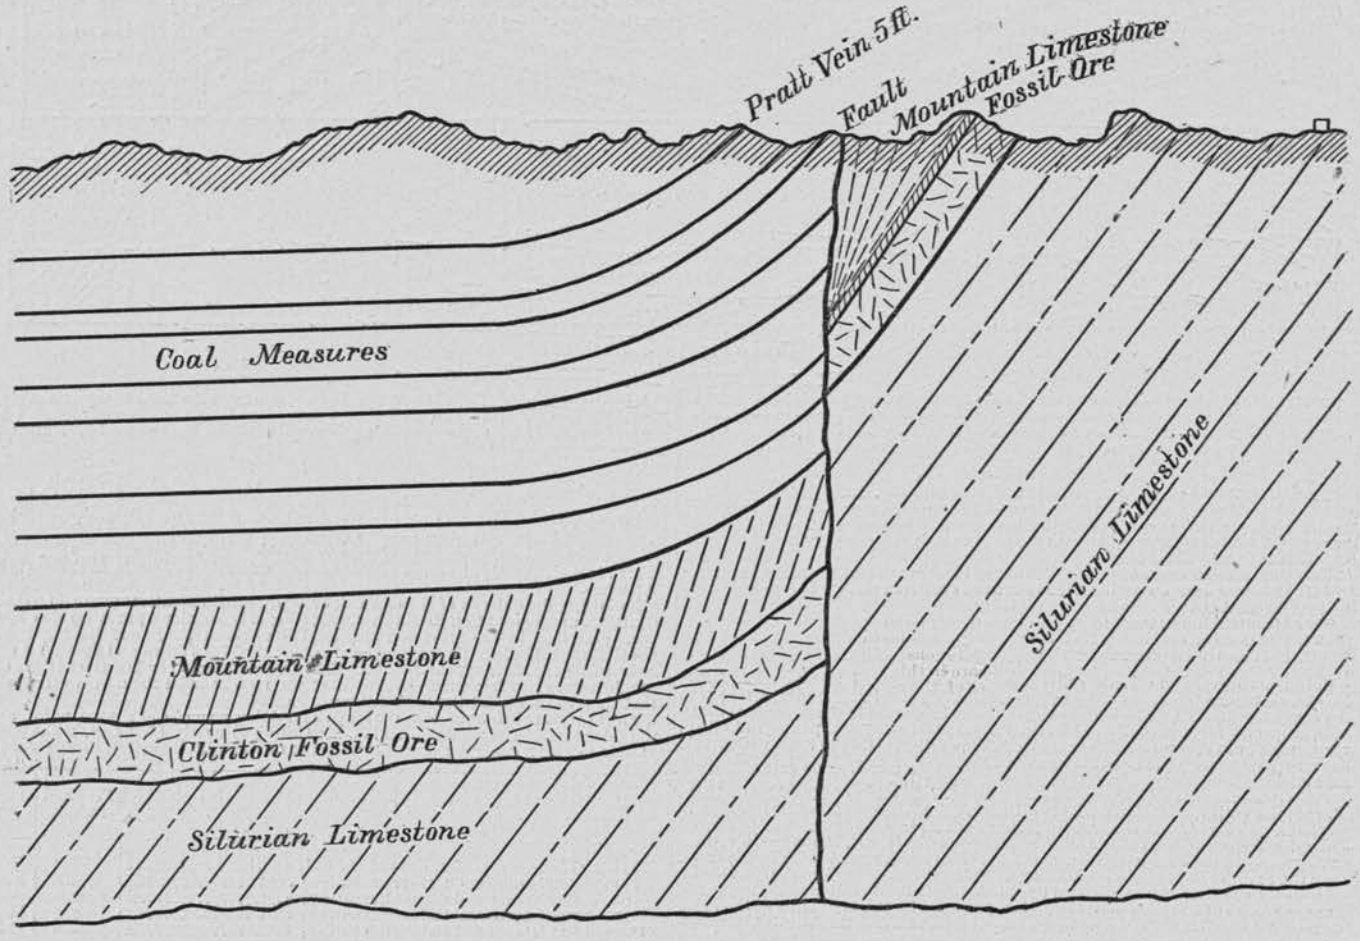
which is undoubtedly the most important and valuable coal-basin in the State of Alabama.

Following the outcrop of the cliffrock or lower conglomerate, through Marshall, Cullman, and Blount Counties, the same geological conditions prevail which have been described in the foregoing chapter, till we reach the line of the North and South Railroad, when the conglomerate gradually sinks down and the upper coal measures make their appearance. At the railroad bridge near Warrior Station the conglomerate may be seen on both sides of the river, and on the northwest side of that river at that point the first coal-basin begins.



The enormous extent of this coal-field containing some 5,000 square miles, and the thickness of the whole formation, amounting to nearly 4,000 feet, make it advisable to give a general section before going into details.

* Pratt Seam.
† Eight-inch slate bed.
‡ Dividing rock, no value on account of slate.

§ Warrior River R. R. bridge.

This field is composed of several basins formed by faults or dislocations, of which the easterly, along the western part of Jones Valley, separates that part which lies between Five-Mile Creek and Reid's Gap from the larger field west of Jones Valley. As this basin is traversed in its whole length by the North and South Railroad, affording every facility for shipping, extensive mining operations have been carried on for several years. The principal seams worked there are the Warrior seam, No. B of the series, the Black Creek seam, No. C, the Jefferson seam, No. D, and the New Castle seam, No. F. Of them the New Castle seam is undoubtedly the most valuable, having a thickness of 5 feet 6 inches, and the coal being of a good quality, in consequence of which the operations conducted on this seam have been so far successful; all others on the lower seams have failed. Under these circumstances, I felt justified to denominate those public lands of this basin as valuable which contain the New Castle seam.

The larger field west of Jones Valley, in Jefferson, Walker, Winston, Fayette, and Tuscaloosa Counties, is also separated in two distinct basins formed by the prolongation of Sequatchee Valley, an enormous upheaval, of which the consequences may be seen far down to the confluence of the Mulberry and Locust Forks of the Black Warrior River.

From the annexed section it will be seen that the great fault, running in a northeasterly direction, about six miles west from Birmingham, brings the higher coal measures to light, and affords the facility of working the same above water-level. This fact is of the highest importance, as the greater part of all mining operations have come to a stand-still by the enormous expenses occasioned by the lifting of coal and water through shafts from great depths by powerful engines.

The Pratt seam, four and one-half feet thick, is worked with great success. The mine is six miles distant from Birmingham, and connected by a branch railroad with the South and North Railroad. The coal is of excellent quality, and makes a good coke, for the production of which article extensive preparations are made. An extension of said branch railroad would lead through the middle of the basin in question, and give easy access to any amount of workable coal-beds, where the coal is at moderate depths, and where the regularity of the measure gives promise of freedom from those faults and disturbances which are so serious a drawback and source of expense in mining operations. I am sorry to say that at the locations of all the Alabama railroads these considerations have been entirely overlooked.

Along the Alabama Great Southern Railroad, south of Birmingham, various veins have been opened and mining operations conducted in a small way.

The most southerly mine at the bank of the Warrior River, near Tuscaloosa, is worked for the insane hospital. The vein is four feet thick, and the coal of good quality. This coal-bed corresponds in position with the New Castle vein in the basin described before.

The next and most westerly basin is doubtless the most important of all on account of its great extension and the amount of workable coal-beds.

The sparsity of the population, the roughness of the country examined, the great extent of the coal-field itself, and the almost complete absence of any accurate information concerning the same, made the survey extremely difficult. But from several coal-beds which were exposed at the banks of creeks, and which have been carefully examined by me, I am convinced that future explorations will reveal in this field a wealth of coal of which we now have very little idea.

A railroad from Tuscaloosa to Tuscumbia, on the Tennessee River, and below the so-called Muscle Shoals, would open to the business world an immense field of workable coal; but it will be very difficult to select the most desirable route for this road.

The surface of the field is very broken, valleys extend in every direction, and, as the road should be built with a view to develop those parts of the field where the largest beds and the most excellent quality of coal is accessible at moderate depths, and where the regularity of the measures make mining operations most profitable, the cost of this will be so enormous that under the existing political situation and the unwillingness of northern capital to invest in southern enterprises, though remunerative, there is no hope that this road will be built for a long time to come, if ever.

The coal-beds I examined were the following: Near Holly Grove, in Walker County, a vein is exposed by the washings of Lost Creek, and some of the coal has been mined for blacksmith purposes. The same contains: Yellow shale roof; coal, upper part slaty, lower much better, with seams of mineral charcoal, four feet; hard clay parting, one-tenth of a foot; coal, good, hard, shining, two feet; coal, slaty, not so good as above, one and three-tenths foot; black slate in bottom, eight feet. As far as I could locate the vein, the same is corresponding with coal-seam P of the series belonging to the upper measure.

The next seam I examined was seen on a little creek near Kansas, in the same county, of five feet thickness and the coal of superior quality. But it was impossible to determine whether it is the same vein as the one above described, though I can assert with certainty that it belongs likewise to the upper measures.

Near the town of Jasper the outcrop of a coal-bed can be seen of three feet thickness and good coal, corresponding with seam G of the series the next above the dividing-rock.

The same vein is exposed at the bank of Black Water Creek, about four miles north of the town of Jasper, but the coal was too sulphurous to be pronounced a good article.

Eight miles below Democrat, in Walker County, a coal-bed was found whose thickness and quality of the coal makes it almost certain that it is the westerly outcrop of the Pratt seam described above, and which convinced me of the fact that the Warrior field was divided into two distinct basins.

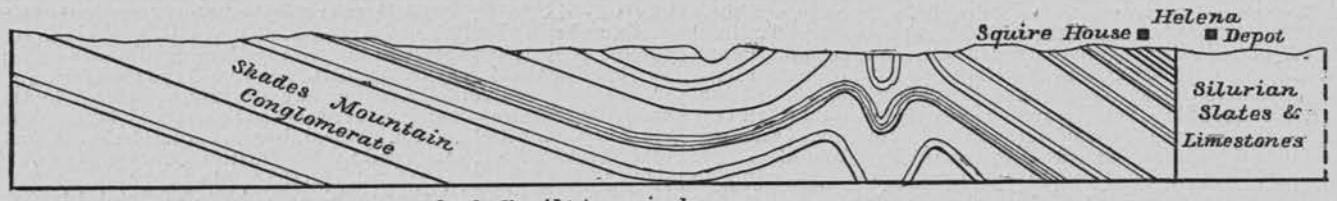
In Appendix A the extent of the workable coal-beds of the three coal-fields, the Warrior, Cahaba, and Coosa coal-fields, are represented in brown colors.

The next coal-field to be described is the

CAHABA COAL-FIELD.

The enormous thickness of the measures, ascertained to be over five thousand feet, renders the lower coals so deep as to be forever inaccessible where the upper measures are on the surface. The maximum available thickness of coal, therefore, will not exceed thirty feet, while at places where the measures are nearly horizontal, as in the western part, but two workable beds are to be found.

The Cahaba coal-field is limited on its southern and eastern side by a fault, which cuts off the coal measures and brings to a level with them the Knox shale and limestones, a formation which belongs at least seven thousand feet below the coal formation, the vertical displacement being a little less than ten thousand feet, or nearly two miles.



The field is divided in the upper or Montevallo group and the lower or Cahaba River group, the former containing part of the upper and the last-named part of the lower veins.

The coal throughout the whole field is distinguished from others by its hardness and absence of sulphur, and the coke made from it is of the very best quality, but the displacement above referred to exerts such an injurious influence on mining operations that all enterprises before and since the war have proved failures. The beds are standing at a high angle, or nearly vertical, and in consequence subject to great irregularities, as will be seen from the above sections. An extensive mining business, conducted by the Eureka Mining Company for several years, was given up during my presence in Alabama. The most powerful engines were not able to raise the waters in the mines, and the company was forced to abandon them with the loss of a capital of not less than $50,000.

Below I give two sections along the S. and N. R. R. and at Five-Mile Run, which are approximately as follows:

Section on S. and N. R. R.

Scale ½ mile to an inch.

Section on Four Mile Creek.

Scale 1 mile to an inch.

I omit, therefore, to give a description in detail of the different veins—the principal features may be seen in the delineation of the two sections above given and in Appendix A, where the position of the seams is approximately indicated—and pass over the description of the

COOSA COAL-FIELD.

This field covers a large area, extending from Calhoun County to the southern part of Shelby County and containing several thousand square miles, but for the greater part only the lower series of the lower measures come to the surface, and the space in which workable coal-beds occur is in consequence very limited. See Appendix A.

There are three seams in township 15, ranges 4 and 5 east, and township 16, range 3 east. The same have a varying thickness from two and one-half to four feet, and the coal which I examined is of a good quality.

The beds are greatly distorted by local faults or displacements, the same being generally inclined at a tolerably high angle, (thirty-five degrees or more,) which has the effect of greatly interfering with mining operations. The fact that only three workable beds of coal have as yet been laid bare in this area, and the occurrence in the midst of this coal-field of the limestones of the underlying sub-carboniferous formation, would seem to speak against any great thickness of coal-bearing rocks.

These fields are at a distance from any railroad, and even if the Coosa River should be made navigable, which traverses the fields in their eastern part, I would have little hope that a remunerative mining business can ever be carried on. I would, therefore, pronounce the whole field as containing no valuable coal-beds, if not the close proximity of the same to the large iron deposits in Clair, Etowah, and Calhoun Counties make it probable that the supply of fuel for working up these deposits will be derived from these beds, and make them in consequence valuable.

For the extent of the coal-beds which might become valuable see Appendix A.

IRON ORES.

The red hematite, known under the name of fossil or dye-ore, extends over one hundred miles on each side of Jones Valley. On the western side the vein reaches a thickness of over thirty feet, but only the upper seven feet of it are workable, the rest, on account of the great amount of silicious matters, is too difficult to smelt. On the western side of Wills's Valley, from the Tennessee line to near the town of Atalla, the vein is only three feet thick, but the silica is here replaced by calcareous matter, which makes it of great value, as mixed with other harder ores it serves as a flux. Extensive mining operations are carried on there, and the ore, on account of its good qualities, is sent to far distances.

LIMONITE OR BROWN IRON ORE.

In all the valleys separating the different coal-fields above described, the Knox shale and dolomite comes to the surface, in which formation limonite is the characteristic mineral. It is found there in pockets or irregular deposits, and furnishes the principal supply to all the iron-furnaces in the State. The yield is always over 50 per cent. The quality excellent, though some of the ores on account of some small percentage of phosphorus makes the iron cold-short. As to the quantity, strings of these pockets run through all the belts of the Knox shale and dolomite formation, forming sometimes smaller, sometimes deposits of enormous extent.

It was impossible for me to examine all the pockets as to their quantity in ore, which would have taken years to perform, and therefore thought it advisable to denominate all places where the surface indications were favorable as valuable mineral lands. In returning the Schedule B furnished me with the order of December 28, 1878, I inclose Appendix C, containing the mineral lands in the Montgomery land district, which are not contained in said schedule and Appendix D, those of the Huntsville land district. In Appendix E a section through the whole mineral lands of Alabama is given in the direction from north to south.

In conclusion, I would state that all the coal-fields above described, with the exception perhaps of the Warrior basin, are so irregular and distorted that all mining operations since a long run of years conducted by the best managers and under the most scientific as well as practical methods, have proven failures, and those who engaged in it suffered great losses and disappointments. All the mines from Jackson County down to and along the South and North Railroad have been abandoned already or will be so in a short time. The losses in some instances are enormous, amounting to $50,000 and more. Add to this that said railroad sells its lands in the coal-fields, which are considered the very best, at prices from $1.50 to $2.25, and that farming lands in Walker and adjacent counties can be bought at still lower prices, and it will be clearly demonstrated that any policy on the part of the General Government to attach to these lands the prices fixed by the coal-land law of March 3, 1873, will virtually close the land offices in Northern Alabama.

In the main these public lands are only valuable for small farmers, who are too poor to buy valley or richer lands, or for men who wish to embark in sheep culture or stock raising generally.

In several coal-fields the percentage of really workable coal is so small, and in others so far distant from all transportation, with no particle of hope to ever get any, that these lands will never be taken up except for the above-named purposes and it will be great benefaction to the State of Alabama, to many of its extremely, poor citizens, both white and colored, and encourage the emigration of foreign settlers, if the lands in question could be disposed of under the common agricultural prices.

Respectfully submitted.

F. WINTER,
Special Agent.

Mr. GARLAND. Before we get to the part of the bill sought to be amended by the Senator from Alabama, I wish to suggest an amendment to the first section, to which I call the attention of the Senator from California, [Mr. BOOTH.] On line 14 of section 1, commencing with the word "found," I move to strike out all from there to the word "thereon," in line 15, inclusive, and to insert after the word "location," on line 14, "for any cause;" so as to read "which said claims were, after such location, for any cause, canceled." The present reading of the bill is "were, after such locations, found to be fraudulent and void, and the entries or locations made thereon canceled."

The bill, if I understand its object, is to enlarge or qualify the claim specified in section 2306 of the Revised Statutes, which reads:

Every person entitled, under the provisions of section 2304, to enter a homestead who may have heretofore entered, under the homestead laws, a quantity of land less than one hundred and sixty acres, shall be permitted to enter so much land as, when added to the quantity previously entered, shall not exceed one hundred and sixty acres.

That takes us back to section 2304, which provides that—

Every private soldier and officer who has served in the Army of the United States during the recent rebellion, for ninety days, and who was honorably discharged, and has remained loyal to the Government, including the troops mustered into the service of the United States by virtue of the third section of an act approved February 13, 1862, and every seaman, marine, and officer who has served in the Navy of the United States, or in the Marine Corps, during the rebellion, for ninety days, and who was honorably discharged, and has remained loyal to the Government, shall, on compliance with the provisions of this chapter, as hereinafter modified, be entitled to enter upon and receive patents for a quantity of public lands not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, or one quarter-section, to be taken in compact form, according to legal subdivisions, including the alternate reserved sections of public lands along the line of any railroad or other public work, not otherwise reserved or appropriated, and other lands subject to entry under the homestead laws of the United States; but such homestead settler shall be allowed six months after locating his homestead, and filing his declaratory statement, within which to make his entry and commence his settlement and improvement.

The words in this bill "found to be fraudulent and void" will raise a good many questions that it will be unnecessary in many cases to raise, and in many instances will absolutely defeat the object of the bill, if I understand it correctly, which is to relieve innocent purchasers who have paid the fees and commissions on these entries, where from any cause their entries failed, not necessarily for a cause that would make the entry fraudulent and void or that would raise those interminable questions that frequently come up in the distinction between what is void and what is voidable. It is to relieve against any matter of mistake, any occurrence that rendered the entry unavailable where the parties paid the lawful fees, and to allow such parties to make another entry, complete and perfect. What gives color to that is that under section 2369 of the Revised Statutes pretty much, though not entirely, such a provision of law exists; and my idea would be to amend section 2369 and make it embrace all entries or attempted entries of this kind; but inasmuch as the committee have reported a bill which appears to have been very carefully considered, we had better take that. I propose to amend the committee's bill so as to let these innocent purchasers make these entries perfect, not merely when the entry has been a fraudulent or void one, but where for any cause it was voidable.

I wish to say, however, that if the Senator from California who has charge of the bill thinks this is not within the scope of the bill, I do not care to interfere with it after its mature consideration by the committee he represents.

Mr. BOOTH. If I understand the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas, I have no objection to it. I think, however, the first section as it is meets the object.

Section 2306 of the Revised Statutes authorizes soldiers and sailors who have made homestead entries within railroad limits an additional eighty acres of land. Under that provision the Commissioner of the General Land Office made rules authorizing proof to be made before a clerk of a court of record, and forged papers were made, and these found a market, and were bought by innocent purchasers. The local land offices frequently allowed entries to be made on such papers and collected the fees. When those entries came to the General Land Office they were canceled because the papers were forged. The object of the first section is to refund the fees paid on void entries. I have no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas.

So far as the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama is concerned, I have not considered it. It is not germane, certainly, to this bill. What he has said in regard to the subject commends it to my favor, and I shall not object to a vote of the Senate on the proposition, though I should have been glad if the subject had been considered by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GARLAND. I understand the Senator from California does not object to my amendment.

Mr. BOOTH. I do not object to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill was at a former sitting read, and its consideration proceeded with as in Committee of the Whole. It is now again before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] is the first amendment in order. It will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 14, after the word "location," it is proposed to strike out "found to be fraudulent and void, and the entries or locations made thereon," and to insert in lieu thereof "for any cause."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTH. In section 4 I wish to make a formal amendment before the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is voted on. I move to strike out in line 1 of section 4 "Commissioner of the General Land Office" and insert "Secretary of the Interior," so as to read:

The Secretary of the Interior shall make all necessary rules, and issue all necessary instructions to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. MORGAN.]

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I am gratified that the Senator from California makes no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama. I am well acquainted with a portion of the country known as the Sand Mountain coal region. There are in Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee millions of acres of coal land. In my own State on Sand Mountain, and Lookout Mountain, it can be purchased at from one to two dollars per acre. The quantity is so great in that large section of country in the three States, that the lands containing it are estimated by their agricultural and other value, and not by the quantity of coal they contain. Any one who wishes to engage in the business of coal mining can at his own price almost purchase all the coal land he wishes. He need pay little if anything more than its agricultural value. Coal mining in that section is a simple business transaction. If well and judiciously managed with sufficient capital, it is profitable. If not backed by sufficient capital, or if badly managed, it is a failure. The coal in the land, therefore, has no market value, and scarcely enhances the value of the land to any extent.

Much of the large section of coal land in Alabama is fit for cultivation. Not much of it is rich; but with proper culture it produces kindly; and if those desirous of settling it could get titles on the terms usual in the disposition of the public lands much of it would soon be settled by a hardy, industrious population. There is a large quantity of coal land in that State which if held at ten and twenty dollars per acre would not find a purchaser in a hundred years. If the Government continues to hold it at those prices it must remain an uncultivated wilderness for a long time to come. If it is open to homestead and to location of land warrants, or if disposed of at public sale, much of it will in a few years be settled by a thrifty population. It seems to me, therefore, that sound public policy requires that it be thrown open to settlement as the public lands are in other States and Territories and as coal lands are now by law in several of the other States. It is due the State of Alabama that her growth, increase of population, development, and prosperity shall not be retarded by the Government holding this large tract of country at a price that it will not command in the market for generations to come. It will be much better to open it up to settlement by disposing of the lands as other public lands are now disposed of, and thereby increase the population of the State and encourage the development of the coal interest itself, as well as the agricultural and other great interests of Alabama. I trust the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. —. That coal lands within the State of Alabama shall be subject to disposal as agricultural lands, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know but that I agree with the purpose of that amendment; but I submit that it is one of those things which ought to be the subject of discussion by itself as a separate proposition; that it is in no way germane to the purpose of this bill. It has not been considered, as I think, by the Committee on Public Lands, where it properly belongs. That condition of things existing in Alabama, however it may be affected by this amendment, is not in any way different materially from the condition of things in Colorado, and other States and Territories. I should be glad to see the subject of legislation on this matter considered and passed upon; but, in order that it may be considered and passed upon intelligently, it ought to be introduced as a separate measure, considered by the committee, and reported in order that the Senate may take up the proposition by itself, unembarrassed by other considerations and other measures, and considered not only with reference to one particular State, but with reference to the public land system of the United States, of which the provision sought to be repealed is part. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Alabama will not insist upon this amendment to this bill at this time.

Mr. MORGAN. The amendment is copied literally from the law relating to Missouri and Kansas. The Senator from Kansas must be entirely familiar with the land law:

Within the States of Missouri and Kansas deposits of coal, iron, lead, or other mineral are excluded from the operation of the preceding sections of this chapter, and all lands in said States shall be subject to disposal as agricultural lands.

I merely desire to put Alabama on a footing with Missouri and Kansas in that respect, and I think I have stated the reasons which justify this motion on my part.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were requested to rise.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think we had better have a little further understanding of that. I should like to have the Senator from Kansas make a statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is dividing and debate is not in order.

The ayes were 15.

Mr. PLATT. Can the amendment be reported again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the amendment will be reported again.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask for those opposed to the amendment to rise.

Five Senators rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is not a quorum of the Senate voting.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays in order to develop the presence of a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Now I should like to hear from the Senator offering it what are the reasons for the amendment. He may have good ones. I should like to hear both sides of the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. MORGAN.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 33, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Bailey,	Davis of W. Va.,	McDonald,	Vest,
Bayard,	Eaton,	Maxey,	Voorhees,

Cameron of Pa.,	Grover,	Lamar,
Carpenter,	Hamlin,	McMillan,

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PLUMB. The title ought to be amended to correspond with the amendment made on the motion of the Senator from Alabama, by adding "and for other purposes."

The title was so amended.

Mr. LOGAN. When the yea-and-nay vote was taken a moment ago I failed to announce the fact that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois] has gone to his rooms on account of illness. He asked me to make the announcement, so that his absence might be explained.

WIDOW OF THOMAS T. THORNBURGH.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1046) granting an increase of pension to the widow of Major Thomas T. Thornburgh, late of the United States Army.

Several SENATORS. There is an adverse report on that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I should like to have that bill taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been objected to and passed over.

PAY OF NAVAL ENGINEERS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1422) to amend section 1556 of the Revised Statutes; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments: in line 3, after the word "that," to insert "from and after the passage of this act," and after the word "they," in line 5, to strike out "take rank as such" and insert "commenced to receive pay as first (passed) assistant engineers;" so as to read:

That from and after the passage of this act the passed assistant engineers of the Navy shall be entitled to receive during the third five years after the date from which they commenced to receive pay as first (passed) assistant engineers, when at sea, $2,450, &c.

Mr. WITHERS. That seems to be a bill to increase the pay of certain officers of the Navy; and as the Senator who reported it is not present to explain it, I move that it be passed over informally, not losing its place, however.

Mr. VOORHEES. I know the Senator from California [Mr. FARLEY] is very anxious about this bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I propose to have it passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BOOTH. My colleague will be here in a moment, I think. I will send for him. The bill can be read meanwhile.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope the bill will not be passed over.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the bill, will the Senator be kind enough to state?

Mr. VOORHEES. It is a bill to amend section 1556 of the Revised Statutes, which relates to a little adjustment of the pay of engineers of the Navy. It is reported by the Senator from California from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and I know personally that he is extremely anxious to have it passed.

Mr. CONKLING. If my friend will hear a suggestion from me, I presume the Senator from California is attending a meeting of the Committee on Commerce, of which he is a member.

Mr. VOORHEES. I know he is.

Mr. CONKLING. Where some of the rest of us ought to be.

Mr. VOORHEES. He can be here in a few minutes. I am obliged to the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs, which has been read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Will the Senator who reported the bill state what change this bill makes in the law as it now is?

Mr. FARLEY. The change in the law is that after the date provided, passed assistant engineers having served a certain time shall receive the compensation that other officers similar to them in rank are receiving. The committee considered the bill very carefully and recommended its passage. It provides that passed assistant engineers shall receive pay as first passed assistant engineers after a certain number of years of service, and it is to put these engineers in the same category after having served ten, fifteen, and twenty years as other officers, and that the amount of their compensation shall be that specified in the bill.

Mr. WITHERS. The attempt is to apply the principle of longevity applied to officers to engineers.

Mr. FARLEY. That is what it is, and no more.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the bill be read once more.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to ask the Senator from California how much this increases the pay of these officers in the aggregate? I suppose that is the object of it?

Mr. FARLEY. About thirteen thousand dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. In all?

Mr. FARLEY. In all.

Mr. VANCE. The estimates make the expense a good deal more than thirteen thousand dollars to increase the compensation of officers who are crowding each other more than is necessary, and who have nothing to do except to guard a few old hulks.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the title be changed by substituting for it "A bill concerning the pay of engineers in the Navy."

It is a very small matter in each individual case for a Senator to rise to; but, in my judgment, there ought to be a rule prohibiting the committees of the Senate from reporting bills, the only title of which is in reference to a section of the Revised Statutes. One very important safeguard in our legislation is the public knowledge of what is going on and what measures are proposed here, and we often get most important suggestions from the people outside; but the pendency of a bill with a title like this gives no information to the public whatever of the proposed legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection——

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to amend the title by saying "increasing the pay," &c.

Mr. HOAR. "Increasing the pay of engineers in the Navy."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) If there be no objection, the title will be so amended.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to state that I am opposed to the principle of this bill. There is no occasion and no necessity for increasing the salaries of these officers.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill increasing the pay of engineers in the Navy."

THOMAS I. MILLER.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 986) for the relief of Thomas I. Miller, of Washington Territory, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of War to examine into and ascertain the loss and damage sustained by Thomas I. Miller, a citizen of Washington Territory, by the seizure and sinking of his ferry-boat on the Columbia River, by the armed forces of the United States during the late Bannock war in that Territory, in 1878, and appropriates $500 to pay the amount of the loss and damage.

Mr. WITHERS. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no printed report, the Chair is informed.

Mr. WITHERS. We ought to have some explanation of it.

Mr. HAMPTON. An explanation of the bill may be found in the certificate of the officer who destroyed the boat in the Bannock war of 1878. To prevent Indians from crossing the Columbia River, Captain Worth, of the Eighth Infantry, was ordered by General Wheaton to destroy all boats upon the river. He gives a certificate showing that in pursuance of these orders he destroyed certain boats, and among them the boat of Thomas I. Miller. The fact being established that the boat had been destroyed in pursuance of military orders the committee recommended the passage of the bill appropriating $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of the value of the boat so destroyed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that in line 16 the word "allow" is evidently a misprint, and it should be "allowed." If there be no objection the bill will be modified in that respect.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAULINA JONES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1719) for the relief of Paulina Jones, widow of Alexander Jones, deceased, of Company E, Second North Carolina Infantry; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there a report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no printed report.

Mr. WITHERS. We should have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. HAMPTON. The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs favorably, and I think there was a unanimous recommendation of the committee for the passage of the bill. The papers are very voluminous. They show that this man was mustered into the service and died in prison, if I recollect aright. It is proposed by the bill to place his name upon the roll. The bill reads as follows:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to place the name of Alexander Jones upon the rolls of Company E, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry, to date from September 1, 1863.

The purpose of placing his name upon the roll is to enable his wife to get a pension.

Mr. WITHERS. Do I understand the Senator to say that the man was mustered into the service regularly? If so, why was he not on the muster-roll?

Mr. HAMPTON. In the papers from the War Department there is the following letter from Adjutant-General Townsend:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ARCHIVES OFFICE,
Washington, April 27, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 22d instant, I have the honor to inform you that from the morning report of the assistant provost-marshal at Richmond, Virginia, March 20, 1864, it appears that Alexander Jones, "spy and dangerous character, arrested in Tennessee, was committed to Castle Thunder on that day." Upon the register of Richmond prison appears this entry: "Alexander Jones, private Company E, Second North Carolina Infantry, captured in Green County, Tennessee, January 25, 1864; arrived from Castle Thunder May 28, 1864; admitted to general hospital No. 21, Richmond, Virginia, May 29, 1864, with 'debilitas;' was sent to Andersonville, Georgia, May 31, 1864." There is no further information to be found in this office or in that of the records of prisoners of war in regard to this man.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

M. S. TEMPLE, Esq., Washington, D. C.

The papers are so voluminous that I cannot go through all of them. They have been placed in my hands after my report, which was made, if I recollect, at the last session of Congress. The committee gave very full consideration to this case, and ordered me to report it favorably.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask the Senator if the information which he has before him shows that this man was really in the service of the Government and in this company? If so, it ought to appear there.

Mr. HAMPTON. There is no doubt about his having been in the service.

Mr. WITHERS. I did not understand how he was mustered into the service when his name did not appear upon the roll.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire whether there is a report in this case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk informs the Chair that there is not a printed report.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the person who is to be put upon the roll, living or dead?

Mr. WITHERS. Dead.

Mr. CONKLING. I would suggest that that at least should appear. One reading the bill would suppose that this was a living man to be put upon the rolls and borne there.

Mr. WITHERS. The object is to form the basis of a claim on the part of his widow for a pension.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I suggest to the honorable Senator, if he has charge of the bill, that for the purposes of identification, if nothing more, the word "deceased" should be added after the name of this man.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] has charge of the bill.

Mr. HAMPTON. The Senator will notice that the bill is entitled "A bill for the relief of Paulina Jones, widow of Alexander Jones," &c. The man must be dead if he has a widow.

Mr. CONKLING. That would be an excellent answer if the title of the bill was a part of the enactment of the bill. If the title recited that it was for my benefit, that would not change the effect of the bill at all. I ask the Secretary to read the bill, not the title, but the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chief Clerk will report the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to place the name of Alexander Jones upon the rolls of Company E, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry, to date from September 1, 1863.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to insert after the name the word "deceased," so that it will read "to place the name of Alexander Jones, deceased, upon the rolls."

Mr. HAMPTON. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and it is agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I should like to inquire how it occurs (no doubt there is some good reason) that this bill comes without any report or anything else from the committee showing that this man was ever in the service. I have not attended to what has been said about it; very likely some Senator has stated that; but my inquiry is why it is not; and my suggestion is that it should be of record in the Senate that there was proof before the committee that this man at least had been in the service. Otherwise, I think Senators must see that this legislation would be a pretty wild and random precedent.

Mr. HAMPTON. My recollection of the case is that I was instructed to report the bill from the Military Committee without amendment and recommend its passage. That was on the 4th of May, 1880, it having been discussed previously in the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not remember whether I made a written report to the committee or not.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Do I understand that this is a bill granting a pension?

Mr. CONKLING. No; it is putting a man on the roll so that his widow may get a pension; the bill is to lay the foundation of that.

Mr. ALLISON. But the man certainly will draw pay if his name is put on the rolls and he did not receive pay.

Mr. INGALLS. Can the Senator from South Carolina inform the Senate when this man died; and while he is searching for information on that point, will he inform the Senate whether if this bill passes he will not be entitled to draw pay from the date his name is placed upon the rolls up to the time at which he died?

Mr. CONKLING. The bill so provides.

Mr. HAMPTON. I can inform the Senator upon the points now. I will read the affidavit of George W. Kirk, late colonel of the Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, County of Washington:

Colonel George W. Kirk, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says that in the year A. D. 1863 he was authorized to recruit and raise a regiment to be known as the Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry. That he did at once go on said duty, and did enlist and secure into the United States service several hundred men for said organization. That on or about the 1st day of September, 1863, this affiant did enlist and swear into the service as a private, Company E, Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry, one Alexander Jones, a resident of Green County, Tennessee. That before there was an opportunity to muster the said Jones into the service, though he had been regularly enlisted and sworn into the service and had drawn arms and uniform, &c., that the said Alexander Jones and this affiant was ordered from Cumberland Gap to Knoxville, Tennessee, to open communication between Major-General Burnside and Major-General Wilcox during the siege of Knoxville, Tennessee, and on arriving at Knoxville, this affiant and the said Jones were ordered to Greenville, Tennessee, then inside of the rebel lines, to watch and report their movements, and that while at Greenville on said duty, the said Alexander Jones was captured by the enemy and taken to prison. This was in January, 1864. That the said Alexander Jones did faithful and hard duty up to the time of his capture. That he was in the fight at Warm Springs, North Carolina, October, 1863, and also in the fight at Cedar Creek, Tennessee, and the march under Major-General Wilcox from Lick Creek, Tennessee, to Cumberland, and was of great service to the Union Army, as he was well acquainted with all the country; that said Jones died at Andersonville prison, as the affiant is informed and believes.

GEO. W. KIRK,
Late Colonel Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 29th day of January, 1875.

[SEAL.] CHARLES H. MOULTON,
Notary Public.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAMPTON subsequently said: I have found the report made to the committee in the case of Alexander Jones and I beg to file it with the papers.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the first and fourth amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, insisted on by the Senate, and agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JAY A. HUBBELL of Michigan, Mr. WILLIAM H. FORNEY of Alabama, and Mr. JOHN A. MCMAHON of Ohio, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the thirtieth and thirty-first amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, insisted upon by the Senate; agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ERASTUS WELLS of Missouri, Mr. OTHO R. SINGLETON of Mississippi, and Mr. JAY A. HUBBELL of Michigan, managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was—

Ordered, That H. P. Robinson be permitted to withdraw the papers in his case from the Senate files, under the rules of the Senate.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF ANIMALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning hour has expired and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. No. 2097) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and for the suppression and prevention of contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. JOHNSTON. At the suggestion of several Senators, the committee have again considered this bill at a meeting and agreed to direct me to withdraw the bill and report another one in the place of it. I therefore report a bill in place of the pending bill, moving it as a substitute, and I shall ask to have it printed. I desire to say in this connection that to-morrow at the expiration of the morning hour I shall endeavor to get the bill up, unless some appropriation bill is in the way.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator cannot withdraw the bill. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent to withdraw the pending bill and substitute the one he has sent to the Chair. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Virginia, I understand, offers what he sends to the Chair as an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He proposes to substitute the amendment for the original bill.

Mr. HARRIS. And he asks that the amendment be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is his request.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to offer a substitute for the pending bill, and I ask that it also may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, and, with the substitute of the Senator from Virginia, will be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I understand that the bill offered by the committee now takes the place of the bill which has been under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. GARLAND. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Virginia has in charge a bill of interest to us all, and that we may understand it alike I beg to state my understanding and see if he assents to it. The bill is the unfinished business now before the Senate. The Appropriations Committee are going to ask him to yield and let it lie aside informally while they take up an appropriation bill. That keeps it subject to the call of the Senator all the time, provided he has it called up before the Senate adjourns at the end of this day. That being the state of the case, the Senator from Virginia offers a substitute for that bill, which has been ordered to be printed, and the Senator from Tennessee also offers a substitute, and that is to be printed, so that when the regular order is resumed it will be the Senator's original bill, to which will be pending the substitute that he has offered, and there will also be pending the substitute offered by the honorable Senator from Tennessee. Is that right?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is right.

Mr. HARRIS. That is the state of the fact.

Mr. GARLAND. I offer an amendment to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Virginia. I move to insert as a concluding section:

SEC. —. That this act shall apply only to cattle in course of transportation between the United States and foreign countries, or between the States, or cattle intended for such transportation.

I ask that the amendment be printed with the others that have been proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be received and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I wish to say one word in regard to the bill. The bill presented by the Senator from Virginia to be moved as a substitute has been printed and is on the tables of Senators; so that there is no necessity for having it printed again. It is printed and on the tables of Senators.

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, there are some amendments to the printed bill which was laid upon the tables this morning that were agreed upon, and the bill ought to be printed again for the use of the Senate. There are not copies enough anyway.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator in charge of the bill gives way to the appropriation bill. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. CONKLING. He gives way informally, having the right to call up the cattle-diseases bill whenever he may choose to do so.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The cattle-diseases bill is not displaced.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is laid aside informally, in order that we may proceed with an appropriation bill.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I am, of course, acting under the order of the Senator from Virginia, who has charge of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I desire to call up House bill No. 7101, known as the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill; and for that purpose I shall have to ask the Senate to lay aside informally the pending order, which is the cattle bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves to lay aside informally the pending order for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope that will not be done by motion, but by unanimous consent.

Mr. THURMAN. It cannot be done on motion.

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly not. The Senator from West Virginia can ask unanimous consent that the regular order be laid aside; nobody will object.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It does not make much difference how it is got out of the way, so that we go on with the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears none.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. COCKRELL, Mr. GARLAND, Mr. INGALLS, Mr. PADDOCK, Mr. TELLER, and Mr. VEST submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KERNAN, Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin, Mr. CALL, Mr. DAVIS of Illinois, Mr. PLATT, Mr. PENDLETON, Mr. CAMERON of Pennsylvania, and Mr. MORGAN submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN. I submit an amendment to the river and harbor bill. This is an amendment for the purpose of diverting a portion of the appropriation. I introduce it by request merely. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce and be ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the post-route bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It will be perhaps best, though it is not necessary, to make a very brief statement of the contents of this appropriation bill before we proceed with its consideration, and I shall ask when its reading commences that we act on the amendments as they are reached in order in the reading of the bill.

Then there is an increase in the appropriations for the internal-revenue service. The Commissioner states that it is actually necessary from the fact that the revenue is growing rapidly. He states that there will be $20,000,000 more collected this year than there was last year. For this current year the revenue is estimated at about twelve million dollars more than last year.

I now ask that the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations be acted on as they are reached in the reading of the bill in their order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order, there being no objection. The bill will now be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was under the head of "Senate," in line 15, after the word "and," to increase from $204,038.76 to $207,451.26, the aggregate of the appropriation "for compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary in the service of the Senate."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 35, after the word "each," to strike out "four" and insert "one laborer in the stationery-room, $1,000; three;" and in line 38, after the word "each," to insert "one page in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, at $2.50 per day, $912.50;" so as to make the clause read:

For keeper of the stationery, $2,102.40; assistant keeper of stationery, $1,800; two messengers, $1,296 each; one laborer in the stationery-room, $1,000; three laborers in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $720 each; one page in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, at $2.50 per day, $912.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 62, after the words "Naval Affairs," to insert "for clerk to the Joint Committee on the Library;" so as to make the clause read:

For clerk to the Committee on Finance, clerk to the Committee on Claims, clerk to the Committee on Commerce, clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary, clerk to the Committee on Private Land Claims, clerk to the Committee on Pensions, clerk to Committee on Military Affairs, clerk to Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, for clerk to the Committee on the District of Columbia, for clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs, for clerk to the Joint Committee on the Library, and for clerk to the Committee on the Census, at $2,220 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line 91.

Mr. COCKRELL. I was aiming to follow the Secretary, but he has read very fast. I ask for an explanation of the provision on page 2, lines 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, and 41. Is that an additional increase to the force of the Senate? I should like to know, if there is an increase of the force of the Senate, what the necessity for it is.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is not an increase. The Senator will notice that we strike out "four" in line 35 and insert "one" in line 36 and "three" in line 37, making exactly the same force; but it does increase the compensation of the laborer in the stationery-room $280. It is an increase of his salary by that amount; but there is no increase of force. The circumstances are these: the laborer in the stationery-room gets $720, and we all know how faithfully he serves; and it was believed by the committee unanimously that he shall receive $1,000, and he ought to have it.

I will state to the Senate that what probably has brought it more prominently to the attention of the committee is that the keeper of the stationery-room has been sick for some time back, and this gentleman has had additional labor on that account.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then in line 39 there is a provision for one page in the Secretary's office.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is not an addition, but it is transferred from a per diem page, as the House put it, through error. He has always existed as an annual page, but the House in error made it a per diem page. He is a page all the year round.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 119, after the words "riding pages," to strike out "and one page for the office of the Secretary of the Senate;" and in line 121, after the word "thousand," to strike out "seven hundred and seventy-five dollars and sixty," and insert "two hundred and thirty-two dollars and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For seventeen pages for the Senate Chamber, including three riding pages, at the rate of $2.50 per day each while actually employed, $9,232.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "for," in line 128, to insert "one foreman in folding-room, $1,200;" and in line 131, after the word "dollars," to insert "in all, $6,675;" so as to make the clause read:

For one foreman in folding-room, $1,200; five folders, at $3 per day while actually employed, $5,475; in all, $6,675.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to strike out lines 133 to 139, in the following words:

And the following prices may be paid for folding books, pamphlets, speeches, and the daily RECORD, namely: For quarto volumes, not exceeding one cent per volume; for octavo volumes, not exceeding one-half cent each per volume; for the daily RECORD, not exceeding $2 per thousand; and for speeches, not exceeding $1 per thousand.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill how the folding in the folding-room is done now?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In the bill last year $10,000 was voted for this extra folding. The Sergeant-at-Arms has stated to the committee, and is very positive about it, that if he has a foreman added to the roll—he asked $1,500 and we allowed him $1,200—he could do without any amount for extra folding, that is, the regular force would do the work if you add a foreman to the regular force. The Appropriations Committee, therefore, thought it would be a saving of $8,800 and they inserted $1,200 for the foreman and struck out the clause for this extra folding that the Senator will see the House put in.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment was under the head of "House of Representatives," after line 280, to insert:

For one employé under Doorkeeper, by resolution of the House of November 6, 1877, $1,314.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 297, 298, and 299 in the following words:

For one employé under the Doorkeeper, by resolution of the House of November 6, 1877, $1,314.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Library of Congress," in line 352, before the word "assistant," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty-three;" in line 353, after the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred;" in line 355, after the word "each," to insert "one at $1,500;" in line 357, after the word "each," to strike out "two at $1,250" and insert "four at $1,400;" in line 358, after the word "each," to strike out "eight" and insert "five;" in line 359, after the word "each," to strike out "four" and insert "three;" and in line 361, after the word "all," to strike out "thirty-six thousand eight" and insert "thirty-seven thousand three;" so as to make the clause read:

For compensation of the Librarian, $4,000; and for twenty-three assistant librarians, two at $2,500 each, one at $2,000, four at $1,600 each, one at $1,500, two at $1,440 each, four at $1,400 each, five at $1,200 each, three at $1,000 each, and one at $960 per annum; in all, $37,340.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Department of State," in line 415, after the word "dollars," to strike out "three" and insert "First Assistant Secretary of State, four thousand five hundred dollars two;" so as to read:

For compensation of the Secretary of State, $8,000; First Assistant Secretary of State, $4,500; two Assistant Secretaries of State, at $3,500 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 432, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for compensation of the Secretary of State, Assistant Secretaries, and the clerks and employés in the State Department from $115,440 to $116,440.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 459, after the word "distributing," to strike out "quarterly;" so as to make the clause read:

For printing and distributing the publications by the Department of State of the consular and other commercial reports, including circular letters to chambers of commerce, provided that such publications may be sold at such rates as may be fixed by said Department, and the proceeds of all sales to be paid into the Treasury, $7,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," in the clause making appropriations for the office of the Supervising Architect, before the word "dollars," in line 506, to strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred;" and in line 510, after the word "thousand," to strike out "four hundred and twenty" and insert "six hundred and seventy;" so as to make the clause read:

Supervising Architect:

In the construction branch of the Treasury, for Supervising Architect, $4,500; assistant and chief clerk, $2,500; photographer, $2,250; one principal clerk, at $2,000; two clerks of class 3; three clerks of class 1; one clerk, at $900; and one assistant messenger; in all, $19,670.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 524, before the word "chiefs," to strike out "five" and insert "six;" in line 525, before the word "clerks," to strike out "eight" and insert "seven;" and in line 529, before the word "hundred," to strike out "three" and insert "six;" so as to make the clause read:

Second Comptroller of the Treasury:
For Second Comptroller of the Treasury, $5,000; deputy comptroller, $2,700; six chiefs of division, at $2,100 each; seven clerks of class 4; twelve clerks of class 3; thirteen clerks of class 2; twelve clerks of class 1; three clerks at $1,000 each; nine clerks at $900 each; one messenger; and three laborers; in all, $93,620.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the clause making appropriations for the Bureau of Statistics, in line 674, to increase the appropriation "for compensation of the officer in charge of the bureau" from $3,000 to $3,600; and in line 680 to increase the total amount of the appropriation from $43,760 to $44,360.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the clause making appropriations for the compensation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the force in his office, in line 709, to increase the appropriation "for the compensation of one deputy commissioner" from $3,200 to $3,500; and in line 718 to increase the total amount of the appropriation from $253,330 to $253,630.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 720, to increase the appropriation "for salaries and expenses of collectors and deputy collectors" from $1,950,000 to $2,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 724, to increase the appropriation "for salaries and expenses of agents and surveyors, for fees and expenses of gaugers, for salaries of storekeepers, and for miscellaneous expenses," from $2,100,000 to $2,300,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the clause making appropriations for "office of the assistant treasurer at Boston," in line 810, to reduce the appropriation for compensation of the assistant treasurer from $5,000 to $4,500.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say a word about that amendment. The House of Representatives have passed the bill appropriating $5,000 for the salary of the assistant treasurer at Boston, and that is in conformity to the law; and there is no repeal of the law in this bill, so that if the Senate pass this amendment making $4,500 instead of $5,000 the salary, the officer will be entitled to go to the Court of Claims and enforce his right to the remaining $500 of his salary.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator allow me a moment? I believe no appropriation bill is passed that does not contain a clause at the end "that this shall be in full of all compensation."

Mr. HOAR. Where is that clause in this bill?

Mr. ALLISON. It is in the beginning instead of at the end.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is in the very beginning in this instance, in lines 5 and 6.

Mr. HOAR. Then the Senator proposes to change the law for this year by that clause?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, sir; this $4,500 has been the salary all along until this year, and the House for some cause not known to the Committee on Appropriations advanced this particular one, when it leaves all the other assistant treasurers, at Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, and Chicago, at $4,500. For some reason or other this particular salary was advanced by the House above all others. We all know, the experience of the past has taught us, that if this one place, Boston, is advanced this year to $5,000, next year all the rest will claim it on the ground that they ought to have the same as Boston.

Mr. HOAR. My statement was strictly correct.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I did not mean to dispute the Senator's statement, except the suggestion that this assistant treasurer would have a right to present a claim to the Court of Claims. That part of it I did dispute.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has called my attention to a clause at the beginning of the bill that may perhaps meet that difficulty; but my statement that this amendment changes the law for this year is strictly correct and the standing law gives this officer $5,000 a year. Although for one or two years past there has been a special appropriation for the year of only $4,500, which may have been, and I dare say was, accompanied by a provision that it should be accepted in full, the standing permanent law still remains at $5,000. I do not believe that any member of the committee (because I do not suppose that even our economical friend from West Virginia would take the attitude that he is going to cut down salaries without any justice or reason, without any proportion whatever to the service rendered or the responsibility) will claim that that law is wrong. The sub-treasurer in the city of Boston has in his charge the second in amount of property of any sub-treasurer in the country. It is larger than at any other point except New York. I am unable to say what number of millions of dollars, it is out of my memory at this moment, but it is undoubtedly as much as fifty or one hundred millions that is sometimes in the vaults of that sub-treasury at once. He gives a bond of $200,000. Giving a bond of $200,000, it is a very serious question whether he is not responsible for the conduct of a very large number of clerks and servants for whom there is no lawful provision for the reception of a bond. It is physically impossible to count, it is physically impossible in any way to manage, this large sum of gold, gold certificates, and other things which have no ear-marks, which are easily stolen, without the assistance of a very considerable number of subordinates.

When the gentleman who holds the office at Boston was appointed the office went begging through that city for weeks before the Administration could find a suitable person who would accept it. The office was offered to a very distinguished and able and excellent gentleman, and accepted by him, and on undertaking to get bonds his friends said to him, "While we are willing to go on your bond if you say so, we do not think you ought to expose yourself or expose us to this vast risk which it is necessary to undertake," and accordingly the gentleman on consideration declined the office.

In the term of the last sub-treasurer before this time, during Mr. Chandler's time, there was a robbery of that sub-treasury by taking out of the vaults the gold certificates, little documents which I understand can be carried in the vest pocket to the amount of millions of dollars, and exchanging them with the teller of a bank; and the courts have held that the bank had a right of action against the Government of the United States, and the bank has recovered a sum amounting to about eight hundred thousand dollars of the Government of the United States in the Court of Claims, and finally in the Supreme Court, by a suit in the Court of Claims and a judgment in the Supreme Court.

The bondsmen of Mr. Chandler were his brother, who is a man of wealth, advanced in years, in the city of Boston; Governor John A. Andrew; Mr. Edmunds, whose estate is in bankruptcy, and one or two other persons, whose estates are in process of settlement. The United States is a preferred creditor, and the dividend in the Edmunds estate has been hung up for five or six years, I do not know but ten years, because of this claim of the United States, which is hanging over their head, which they cannot get in any way settled. The Senate at every session of Congress has passed, and passed unanimously, a bill to relieve the estate of that sub-treasurer from the bond; but it does not get attention in the other branch. Mr. Chandler, a man worth a few hundred thousand dollars, has this claim of $100,000 hanging over his head without any means of knowing whether his whole fortune is to be swept away. The estate of Governor John A. Andrew, to whom this country owes something, stands in the same condition.

Now, no Senator who knows the vast personal risk that every sub-treasurer must take under these circumstances will say that the law is wrong in this matter. I have not heard any such suggestion from any quarter. The House of Representatives, I suppose I may say without giving any offense to that honorable body, or without violating parliamentary law, is not very likely to be wasteful and prodigal in increasing the salaries of republican officials; and yet the House yielded to the obvious justice and propriety of appropriating for this sub-treasurer the amount which the law fixes. There is not a gentleman in this Senate who would permit his son or his brother or his friend, without a remonstrance, to accept the risk which under the law as it is to-day this officer is obliged to encounter. It is not only a risk of ruin, a risk of bankruptcy by the act of some subordinate whom he cannot control, but it is a risk of irretrievable and permanent ruin and bankruptcy, of incapacity ever to settle the claim, ever to get the claim of the United States out of the way, to have it hanging over his head forever, unless he can get a bill through Congress for his relief.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Massachusetts, as I understand him, has stated that by the existing law the salary of this gentleman is $5,000.

Mr. HOAR. It is.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Is that sure? I understand the chairman of the committee to question that.

Mr. HOAR. Now, let me make the statement. The existing law I hold in my hand, and it fixes the salary of the assistant treasurer at Boston at $5,000 a year. It is section 3596 of the Revised Statutes. For the last two or three years, two years I think before this, the Committee on Appropriations have included a clause in the appropriation bills fixing the salary at $500 less for each year, and for the year alone, and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations thinks—and I do not enter upon any debate with him on that point, though I think it is quite a debatable point—that the insertion of the words "in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30" makes such an appropriation an obstacle in the way of the officer going to the Court of Claims for the unappropriated balance. Be it so. It is, then, simply saying to that officer, "We will not repeal the law, but you shall have for your services for this year $500 less than the existing law allows." That is what this bill proposes to do now.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Do I understand that the Committee on Appropriations claim that they have a right to appropriate to a man less than the salary fixed by law?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly they do. The Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. HOAR. Not at present.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I thought you would not want me to put in there.

Mr. HOAR. I will yield to the Senator from West Virginia to repeat that remark if he would like to do so.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, it is all right.

Mr. HOAR. The Committee on Appropriations, as I understand it, claim the right without having the existing law repealed and without having the action of the appropriate committee to whom the discharge of that duty belongs, and who are charged with the regulation of the salaries of all the officers whom the vast machinery of our Government demands, to come in and take possession to that extent of the whole legislation of the country and to say, "Although both Houses of Congress have fixed a salary at one sum we will put into the appropriation bill an appropriation for a less sum and make the officer take it in full for the year."

I do not propose to debate the propriety of this claim. It may be necessary for the economical transaction of the business of this country that the Committee on Appropriations should exercise that discretion, and I have refrained from making that point which the honorable Senator from Georgia suggests. I want to steer this case clear of that question. I say to the Committee on Appropriations that having had occasion to know that this office of sub-treasurer at Boston went begging a year or two ago when Mr. Kinnard was appointed, having occasion to know from the experience of families who are among my personal friends that a man holds that office at constant peril of utter and irretrievable ruin under the law as it now stands, I think my friends on that committee will agree and ought to agree that the existing law is right and that it is not fair to come in at a time when you cannot get the attention of one-third of this body and take out of that officer under the circumstances this petty little sum that they seek to retrench his salary.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I desire to appeal to the Senator from West Virginia, if he will listen to me in regard to this case, in order that he may not only permit this to be raised $500, but to be so satisfied that it is right that he will not surrender it in committee of conference——

Mr. HOAR. Let me say the House have put it at $5,000, according to the existing law, without any objection so far as I know. Now the Senate Committee on Appropriations, undoubtedly without full consideration, propose to strike it down.

Mr. MORRILL. I happen to know a gentleman who left this office in consequence of the inadequacy of the salary, and I undertake to say that there is not a Senator here, if he were in that business, who would insure the vast amount of the transactions of the sub-treasury at Boston for the entire amount of the salary. It could not be insured in any insurance company for the entire amount of the salary. The gentleman who has charge of the place now is one who might command a much higher salary in any commercial business.

I hope, therefore, the Senator from West Virginia will see the propriety of allowing this to remain, and it does not follow that the salaries of the other sub-treasurers should be raised if this shall remain where the House has fixed it, for there is but one other where the amount of business is anything like the magnitude of that at Boston.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to make an observation in response to that made by the Senator from Massachusetts with reference to the disposition of the Committee on Appropriations to draw unto itself the fixing of salaries. I am rather inclined to be in sympathy with him as to this particular amendment, but I wish to say a word upon the general subject of salaries by law and salaries in appropriation bills.

In 1876, if I remember rightly, we had a spirit of economy prevailing, not in this body so much as in some other portions of this Capitol, whereby salaries were cut down right and left without reference to existing law in any respect, and the Senate finally yielded that question and a large number of salaries were reduced, and this salary of the sub-treasurer at Boston, I believe, among them, and a large number of other salaries. Since that time the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate have never undertaken to make appropriations absolutely as provided by law, and there are in this bill, unless I am mistaken, at least fifty instances where the appropriations for compensation this year are less than the salaries provided by law. That was a streak of economy that grew up some years ago, and the Committee on Appropriations have been too deferential and too timid in their operations to run against the sentiment of the Senate and the House with reference to these matters. It has had no disposition whatever to aggrandize the question of legislation about salaries; it would prefer, I believe, to appropriate according to the salaries provided by law; it has felt itself instructed and under restrictions with reference to these salaries where they have been reduced on appropriation bills heretofore in violation of existing statutes.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I rise to second the appeal of my colleague to the Committee on Appropriations on the part of the Senate. I have no disposition to arraign the committee. There is, I know, a desire to intimate to the Senate that they do not wish to carry out existing law when they can consistently with a proper regard to economy; but this case stands rather upon exceptional grounds. The House of Representatives have been convinced, as we suppose, nor as we present the case to the Senate the Senate will be satisfied that in this particular instance the salary provided by law is in itself very inadequate to the responsibilities as well as to the duties of the office. It is exceptional, as the case of the sub-treasurer at New York is. His salary is properly fixed at $8,000 by law, and neither the House nor the Senate have thought that was a proper case to cut down the salary, because it is an office of more than usual responsibility. This is the second office, next to that; and every one who is acquainted with the duties of this office will say that whether there are other offices where it would be proper to cut down the salary $500 or not, this office is one where it cannot properly be done.

What is $500 by the side of a good competent official there in whose hands the sum of money deposited is perfectly safe? Five hundred dollars is a very small item, and yet, without disparagement to other places, it is a matter of great difficulty, as has been said by my colleague, to get a man that the Committee on Appropriations themselves would think for a moment ought to be put in that office merely for the compensation which the statute provides, and here is a cutting down of $500 from that office in the interest of economy. Economy is wise and proper always, but it is not always wisely applied in the cutting down of expenditures, as I have had some occasion to know in my experience. I know that sometimes we make great mistakes in that way. I do not mean to say that this committee have meant to do any such thing. I see that this committee in other places have raised the compensations even that the House have prescribed. They have put $1,000 upon the salary of an Assistant Secretary of State and they have put $600 on that of the chief in charge of the bureau of statistics—all proper enough—but what is either responsible for? Responsibility for not a penny of money. Neither has to give a bond. I appeal to the Senator from West Virginia in all good faith and with entire respect, that he would not go and ask his friends to sign a bond for $200,000 for him in any capacity, however much confidence they would deservedly have in him, for any paltry compensation of $4,500 a year; and yet this man has, I think, thirty clerks under him, and some of them are appointed without any voice of his. The clerk under the last assistant treasurer, who took out $800,000, he did not appoint. The law sent him there by the appointment of the Secretary of the Treasury, and he had no voice in the selection and ought not to have any responsibility; and yet there hangs over him and his estate and the estate of his bondsmen the penalty of $800,000 for the act of a man he had no voice in appointing. This man, for the sum of $5,000 if he has what the law allows, is liable to-day for the honesty of men whom he has no voice in appointing.

I therefore make this appeal with all respect to the committee and respect to their motives and desire for economy, to let this item be as the House have passed upon it after due consideration of the matter.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Will my friend from Georgia allow me to make one statement to the Senate, which I intended to make when I was up before, which is in connection with what my colleague has said?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. When the Mellen robbery was discovered in the sub-treasury at Boston, under which a clerk in the sub-treasury and a bank-teller were in the habit of making the accounts in the bank good by exchanging gold certificates, taking them from the sub-treasury and giving them to the bank-teller when the bank was to be examined, and then taking them out of the bank and putting them back, for which the United States was finally held responsible by the Supreme Court, the clerk who was guilty in the sub-treasury made a confession to one of his official superiors, (not the sub-treasurer himself, but another official who had accesss to the vault,) and that superior demanded that he should go to the bank-teller and get the gold coupons or certificates, whatever they are called, and restore them to the vault of the United States; and that was done. They went together in the evening and opened the vault and put them back. After that had been done and they were walking away together, the sub-treasurer said he thought he would return and put those documents in a still more secure place, a different place in the vault. "Why," said the clerk, "I have got them here;" and although they had gone together on that errand that fellow had taken in his vest pocket the $800,000 of certificates in the very presence of the man to whom he had just confessed his guilt. That came out in the trial of the case. It is as easy for one of quite a number of officials to take from that treasury vault—or it was at that time; what additional precautions may have been suggested since I cannot say—it is as easy to steal a million dollars' worth of property as it would be to steal a card of court-plaster out of some desk in this Senate Chamber. That is the responsibility which is placed by the law upon this gentleman, and as I said before, the office to my knowledge almost went begging when the present incumbent was appointed.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I merely have a word to say in this matter for myself. I do not know the gentleman in this case, nor do I know anything of the facts in the case, nor do I know or even have an opinion whether the salary of $5,000 or $4,500 would be a proper salary for this officer, whether it would be too much or too little. I have nothing to say on that subject, therefore; but I want to make two remarks for myself, which I have long felt ought to be made, and ought to be made by everbody connected with the legislation of this country.

In the first place, I think it is an important principle, almost a principle, certainly a very wise policy, which ought to be adhered to, to fix salaries by law. All salaries, where it can be done, except perhaps in some ministerial offices, ought to be fixed by law. That was the idea of the framers of the Constitution, and there is a great deal to be said in favor of this proposition.

Then when the salaries are fixed by law, by which I mean regular legislation, those salaries ought to be paid by appropriations. The habit of changing salaries by appropriation bills, in my judgment, is a wrong system, with all due deference. I know it has been practiced, but in my judgment it is a wrong practice, a very unwise one, and renders the subject of salaries extremely unstable and unreliable. If the law fixing a salary is wrong, let it be changed; but while the law remains upon the statute-books the appropriation ought to be made according to law. The function of an appropriation bill ought to be simply to appropriate the money to carry out the law as it exists. That is my judgment in this case, and I simply put it on record.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As to the salaries being fixed by the law, we all know that since the days of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who had charge of the Appropriations Committee in the other House for many years, salaries have been fixed more or less on appropriation bills. Hardly a question ought to arise upon that point.

The salaries of the assistant treasurers at Philadelphia, at Baltimore, at Cincinnati, and at Chicago are all $4,500. The Committee on Appropriations thought themselves justified in placing that at Boston on the same footing as the other towns that I have named. No information generally was given to us further than we saw that that one office stood at $5,000 and that the others remained at $4,500. For that reason, and to get information from the House, we believed that we should substitute $4,500 for $5,000. The two Senators from Massachusetts as well as the Senator from Vermont who have spoken have convinced all the committee I believe, at least they have convinced me, being in charge of the bill, that $5,000 for the Boston office is not too much. Whether $4,500 is enough for the others is another question, and we can deal with that when it comes up. I think probably the amendment of the committee ought to be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 827, to reduce the total amount of the appropriation for the office of assistant treasurer at Boston from $36,060 to $35,550.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. As a consequence of the amendment of the committee which has just been rejected, the Senate will have to disagree to this amendment also.

The amendment was rejected.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the appropriations for "Territory of Utah," in line 1164, to reduce the appropriation "for legislative expenses, namely, for compensation and mileage of members of the Legislative Assembly, the officers, clerks, public printing, and the contingent expenses thereof, and the contingent expenses of the secretary's office," from $25,500 to $19,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "War Department," in line 1214, after the word "dollars," to strike out "eight" and insert "four messengers; four;" and in line 1217, after the word "thousand," to strike out "four hundred" and insert "eight hundred and eighty;" so as to make the clause read:

For compensation of the Secretary of War, $8,000; one chief clerk, at $2,500; one disbursing clerk, at $2,000; one stenographer, at $1,800; two chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; five clerks of class 4; four clerks of class 3; four clerks of class 2; twelve clerks of class 1; one clerk, at $1,000; four messengers; four assistant messengers; seven laborers; and six watchmen for the Department building; in all, $69,880.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the appropriations for the office of the Adjutant-General, in line 1233, after the words "class one," to insert "and twenty-five clerks, at $1,000 each;" and, in line 1237, after the word "pensions," to strike out "thirty-six thousand" and insert "one assistant messenger; in all, sixty-one thousand seven hundred and twenty;" so as to make the clause read:

For thirty additional clerks of class 1, and twenty-five clerks at $1,000 each, to be exclusively engaged in preparing and making reports to expedite the settlement of pension applications called for by the Commissioner of Pensions, one assistant messenger; in all, $61,720.

Mr. PLUMB. At this point I desire to ask a question of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, having this bill in charge. This is to add twenty-five clerks to the permanent force of the Adjutant-General's Bureau, as I understand. I have before me what purports to be the testimony of the Adjutant-General given before the Committee on Appropriations, and I desire to ask the Senator if this force of twenty-five additional clerks is supposed to be sufficient to make effective the number of clerks, which is given in the subsequent part of the bill for the Pension Office.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I am gratified that the Senator has asked the question. After the debate upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and also the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to the pension appropriation bill, the Committee on Appropriations felt it incumbent to call before the committee the Commissioner of Pensions, the Adjutant-General, and the Surgeon-General, which they did, and the testimony was taken down and is in print. After a good deal of thought on the part of the Appropriations Committee they believed that it would facilitate considerably the three bureaus interested in pensions to increase the force in this way. To the Pension Bureau are given about one hundred and thirty additional clerks, and upon that basis the estimate of twenty-five each was made for the Adjutant-General's Bureau and the Surgeon-General's Bureau. In other words, if there had been two hundred and fifty clerks added in the Pension Office, they wanted fifty in each of these bureaus, about one-fifth of what was given to the Pension Office, in order to facilitate their business. After the hearing, the committee thought that one hundred and ninety-six clerks should be added to these three bureaus, that of the Commissioner of Pensions, of the Adjutant-General, and of the Surgeon-General; and the committee after consideration believe that the number given in each case is just in proportion to what ought to be given to facilitate the pension business.

Mr. PLUMB. I observe on page 21 of the testimony given before the committee, in the statement of General Drum, the following:

Senator WALLACE. We should like an estimate of the additional number of clerks upon the basis of two hundred additional clerks of the Pension Department, &c.

General Drum goes on to say:

If the Pension Bureau have two hundred, I certainly should have fifty to enable me to answer their calls, and I would have to get a new building and new furniture and everything of that kind.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator will notice that we have provided for the rent and for furniture for such a building.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not criticising the action of the committee on that point. General Drum says on page 17 of his testimony:

We are getting along pretty well, but not very rapidly, as you can see by my falling behind, as I am to day, just on the simple matter of pensions. I am behind the Pension Bureau now nearly twelve thousand.

To be nice about the calculation, the Adjutant-General estimates that if there are two hundred clerks added to the force of the Pension Bureau he would need fifty clerks in his Department in order to keep up. That would be at the rate of one to four. The committee have added one hundred and thirty clerks in the Pension Bureau, I find by looking at the amendment on page 68, which would require, in order to keep up the pension business as stated by the Adjutant-General, about thirty-five men additional. Besides that, he is behind in his work already about twelve thousand cases.

I do not care to be critical about this matter. The committee have made a very liberal estimate of the amount, much to my gratification, I will say to the Senator; but I want to call his attention to the point that it is desirable to have the work of the clerks in the Pension Bureau made effective, and there is no saving in having a clerk working there unless the force necessary be added to the Adjutant-General's Office or Surgeon-General's Office in order that his work may be made complete.

I wanted to ascertain definitely if the number of twenty-five clerks named was according to the estimate of the committee sufficient for that purpose. It seems to me that on the basis of the statement made by the Adjutant-General it is not sufficient.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will state that to the very point about which the Senator inquires the Committee on Appropriations gave all the consideration they could, and perhaps spent two or three days in getting the testimony and facts from the different officers. Notwithstanding the testimony that the Senator reads, he will notice, if he will read it carefully, that in general terms the Adjutant-General thought he could get along with what he had in the office. Then we said, "Suppose we add two hundred clerks to the Pension Office, how much would you then desire?" And his answer is just as the Senator stated, fifty; or, in other words, one-fourth. The Appropriations Committee gave one hundred clerks to the Pension Bureau for the particular service that the Adjutant-General was dwelling upon, and thirty clerks additional for other purposes, copyists, &c., that they wanted there, so that actually about one hundred of them are intended to be employed in the direction the Senator speaks of, and not one hundred and thirty. The committee thought just as the Senator thinks, that it would be of no use to increase one office beyond what another office could supply; that otherwise one office would be waiting on the other. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] also referred to that, and first brought my attention to it. The committee examined it as carefully as they could, and they gave each of these offices what they thought could be employed properly and enable them to keep pace with each other. So to the Adjutant-General we give twenty-five clerks, based upon one hundred clerks in the Pension Office. I might say that we have added nearly two hundred persons expressly for facilitating pension claims under this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. The actual addition to the Pension Office is "twenty examiners at $2,000 each, twenty clerks of class 4, twenty clerks of class 3, twenty clerks of class 2, fifty clerks of class 1," with the proper complement of messengers, watchmen, &c. That makes an addition of one hundred and thirty to the present working force.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But the Senator will recollect that part of those are intended to go to work and copy and get the rolls in the Pension Office in a proper condition. Probably twenty-five or thirty of them will be detailed on that work at once, and only one hundred will be added to the force employed in the examination of pension claims.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should be glad to have the attention of the Senator from West Virginia a moment. Is there any appropriation in this bill that can be applied to the payment of rent for additional room for these clerks?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, sir; for each of the bureaus. The Commissioner of Pensions, the Adjutant-General, and the Surgeon-General each said, "If you give additional force you must give us additional room, for we shall have to rent a building." The committee then asked each of them to make an estimate of the cost of the furniture and the rent for each one of the bureaus, which was sent to us; and we gave them exactly what they said would be required.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. And you make such an appropriation for the Adjutant-General's Office, the Surgeon-General's Office, and the Office of the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, sir. In round numbers the force is increased nearly two hundred clerks and messengers in all. I will say to the Senator that we make a part of the appropriation immediately available, so that they can go to work at once and need not wait until July next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "dollars," in line 1239, to insert:

And for the employment of twenty-five clerks, at the rate of $1,000 per annum each, for the like purpose, for the balance of the current fiscal year, and for one assistant messenger, $6,430; the latter sum to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1244, to insert:

For rent of building, $1,500; $300 of which sum shall be available for the current fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1250, after the word "repairs," to strike out "twelve thousand" and insert "fourteen thousand five hundred;" and in line 1251, after the word dollars, to insert "$1,750 of which sum shall be available for the current fiscal year;" so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses, to wit, for stationery, printing, purchase of additional file-cases, and for office furniture and repairs, $14,500; $1,750 of which sum shall be available for the current fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in the appropriations for the office of the Surgeon-General, in line 1305, before the word "clerks," to strike out "forty" and insert "sixty-five;" so as to read:

For sixty-five clerks, at $1,000 each, to be exclusively engaged in preparing and making reports to expedite the settlement of pension applications called for by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB. I desire to direct the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to this paragraph. I observe that the committee has added twenty-five additional clerks for the office of the Surgeon-General. In the testimony of the Surgeon-General before the Committee on Appropriations, speaking in response to a question by Senator ALLISON, I find the following statement made by him:

If I may go on, I will say that when I represented my office before the sub-committee of the House Committee on Appropriations, I said that I should have asked for fifty clerks, but that I had no place to put them. I have no room for an additional number.

Senator ALLISON. You would have asked for fifty more if you had?

Surgeon-General BARNES. For fifty more; but I have no desk-room for them. I could use fifty more advantageously.

Senator ALLISON. Upon pension matters?

Surgeon-General BARNES. Upon pension matters.

Senator WALLACE. That is, in answering demands made upon you for information by the Pension Bureau?

Surgeon-General BARNES. Yes, sir.

Then the Surgeon-General goes on to read some extracts from his report, showing the existence of the necessity, which he puts in the shape of an estimate, for fifty clerks upon the basis of the business then in the office, and not with reference to any increase of business whatever.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator will allow me, I think he will find in the beginning of the Surgeon-General's testimony that the basis is upon an addition of two hundred clerks to the Pension Office. It will be recollected that the Commissioner of Pensions had not appeared before us, and we were going in the dark, but saying among ourselves that we might increase the force of the Pension Office two hundred if we thought it practicable to do so.

I will state to the Senator that the committee intended to be liberal, and to furnish that at which they might work along and each office correspond with the other in furnishing information. In some degree, I will say to the Senator, we were governed by what the Commissioner of Pensions said when he came before us, as well as by what the other officers said; that is, asked the Commissioner of Pensions, "How far are you behind, and what are the other offices doing for you?" He said, "We do not make much complaint of those offices, but yet we are behind some months. There is no special complaint to be made."

I will say to the Senator now that I, on the part of the committee, would be perfectly willing to accept any increase if I believed it would facilitate work in that Department, and I would increase it whatever was necessary; but the committee fully believe that what they have done will just about keep pace with the other two offices.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not disputing that, but I am examining the testimony which I have before me, which was given before the committee. I am endeavoring to see if the report which the committee has made accords with it. I think the Senator from West Virginia is mistaken. I only desire what the committee desire; I have no doubt that the force provided for the Pension Bureau may be applied as aptly, as connectedly, and as efficiently as possible.

On page 2 of this testimony Surgeon-General Barnes speaks further on the subject. Senator ALLISON asked him this question:

You could use fifty more clerks advantageously if you had desk-room for them?

This is not accompanied by any statement or any hint or insinuation that there is to be any increase of force whatever in the Pension Office, but it relates to the present condition of things, and the Surgeon-General continually re-enforces his statement by a reference to the report which he had made before that time, in which the necessity for an increased force was set out at length and emphasized. Surgeon-General Barnes, replying to the question of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] says: "I could." That is, I could use fifty clerks more advantageously if I had desk-room for them. He goes on to quote further from his report. At the last paragraph of the report, as quoted on page 3, he says:

I estimate that twenty-five clerks should be constantly employed for this purpose for some years to come.

That means the purpose of copying the records in his office, replacing those which are worn out. He says, in further answer to a question by the chairman, on page 3:

I could make an advantageous use of fifty men if I had a place provided for them.

On page 5 this occurs in response to a question by the chairman as to the routine of the office upon the subject of inquiries made in regard to pension cases:

Surgeon-General BARNES. If it went into the regular routine to-day it would go in with twenty-thousand ahead of it; there are over twenty thousand ahead of it to-day.

Senator ALLISON. In other words, you have twenty thousand unanswered cases?

Surgeon-General BARNES. Yes, sir. If it waited its turn it would go in that way.

Senator ALLISON. You have not answered yet how long.

Surgeon-General BARNES. I will try to give you statistics. Search was made and replies furnished to the proper authorities in thirty-six thousand two hundred and seventy-seven cases in one year; so that if you take it for granted that to-day I am twenty thousand cases behindhand, it will take two-thirds of a year to answer an inquiry coming in now, thirty-six or thirty-seven thousand being a year's work.

So it seems that in providing twenty-five clerks, as it appears from this testimony, the committee has not added more than force enough to dispose of the cases now in the Surgeon-General's Office behind the requirements of the Pension Office. The chairman, Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, asked this question:

It would take eight months ordinarily?

That is, eight months ordinarily to get rid of the accumulated business, if no new business came in.

Surgeon-General BARNES. It would take eight months.

Senator WALLACE. In addition to the twenty-five clerks that you spoke of as necessary for copying the records——

Surgeon-General Barnes, interrupting—

Absolutely necessary.

Senator WALLACE. Supposing we give you the room for them and the cheap desks that are necessary, how many can you with your chiefs and heads of division effectively work to expedite these demands in pension cases?

Surgeon-General BARNES. Twenty-five more. I think fifty would be a very moderate estimate of the number that could be made practically useful, provided, always, that I have room to work them in.

Senator WALLACE. That is implied.

Senator ALLISON. Could you use more than fifty?

Surgeon-General BARNES. No; I think they would work over each other; one person would wait for another. This subject I have been considering very deeply for some time. A year ago I got forty additional clerks because I was stalled. Then I went to work and brought up my arrearage. On the 1st of July, 1880, the number of cases remaining on hand unanswered was only 6,964. I had knocked off by the increase of force an immense arrearage. The experience of the past year shows that it was advantageous to have that increase. I got off a great deal of work.

Senator ALLISON. You consider this copying absolutely essential?

Surgeon-General BARNES. Yes; otherwise the books may be lost.

On page 6, in response to a question by Senator WALLACE, asking him to give in detail an estimate of what it would probably cost, Surgeon-General Barnes says:

I would say that fifty clerks at $1,000 a year, $50,000; the rent of a building and fuel and the pay of a messenger and a watchman ought to be brought within $10,000, which would make an estimate for my office of $60,000; but if it went in a lump of $200,000 I do not know where I would come out.

I do not find in the cursory examination which I have given to the testimony of the Surgeon-General that any reference whatever is made either by a question propounded to him or in his reply to a question that there is to be any increase whatever in the force of the Pension Office. His estimate appears to be based upon the existing necessities of his office, to wit, twenty-five clerks for copying records which are worn out, and twenty-five additional clerks for the purpose of disposing of the pension cases now on hand, such as are coming in from the current business of the Pension Office as at present equipped.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I was under the impression when I first spoke that in connection with this statement the Surgeon-General had been informed that we proposed to increase the force of the Commissioner of Pensions, but I find in looking over it that that does not appear in the evidence, though I think it had taken place in conversation, and we had asked him to base his calculation upon the increase at the Pension Office by two hundred men. The Senator will find the next statement is that of Commissioner Bentley. They were both in the committee-room at the same time. However, that matters not.

If the Senator now believes that further force necessary, the committee will not object to it. We want to give these officers just what will bring up their work and enable them to work together, that is, so that one office can supply information as another calls for it. The sub-committee especially, who heard all the evidence, and who examined into this matter carefully, believe that the number given in the bill would be just what is needed to advance the public service in reference to pension cases. If the Senator from Kansas thinks the committee are wrong, and if he wishes to make an addition, I do not know that the Committee on Appropriations will object to it, if it is a reasonable addition. I hardly think, however, that the public service will be subserved by it. That is our opinion.

Mr. PLUMB. I accord to the committee all that the Senator from West Virginia claims for it, and express my gratification that that committee acted on this matter so promptly and on the whole satisfactorily; but I find that in the report of the Surgeon-General, made long prior to the examination and prior to the debate which brought out the examination, he said that twenty-five additional clerks were absolutely necessary for his office for one single purpose, to wit, the replacing of worn-out records which had of necessity to be examined in order to reply to inquiries made by the Pension Office. That is the exact number which the committee have added. This does not take into account any other increase in the work of the office or any additional labor to be performed; nothing except only the replacing of these worn-out records. Now, we precipitate upon this office the work of one hundred and twenty additional clerks in the Pension Office, and I submit that unless we are to throw away or render inoperative during the next twelve months the work of these additional clerks of the Pension Office, there ought to be an increased force in the office of the Surgeon-General.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. May I ask the Senator from Kansas what he would suggest, as the object which he and I and the committee want to reach is the same? We want to accomplish the good of the service both to the Government and the pensioner. Will the Senator suggest what he thinks will accomplish it?

Mr. PLUMB. To be entirely safe, I think the number in the Surgeon-General's Office ought to be increased at least to the amount he asked, independent of the increased force of the Pension Office, that is, fifty clerks. There are two or three reasons why that is necessary. It is in the line of economy of time. If a claim is waterlogged, so to speak, in the Surgeon-General's Office, it will be the subject of two or three inquiries during a session of Congress on the part of members of the House and Senators who may be solicited to make those inquiries. The occasion of a large amount of extra labor is in replying to letters, and but for which the ordinary business of the office would move more rapidly.

I think myself that in view of what the Surgeon-General has stated, the number of clerks in line 1305 ought to be made ninety in place of sixty-five, and I will move, if no one else will, to make the number of clerks ninety.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest to the Senator, as there is a difference of opinion between the committee and himself, and as the committee have tried to arrive at the same end that he has in view, whether he had not better stop a little short of that number. Twenty-five would be rather a large increase. I suggest to the Senator to add fifteen to the sixty-five and make it eighty instead of ninety, and not say what they are to do, letting the Surgeon-General employ them in copying if he thinks proper, or put them on pension work just as he may be pressed to do. That is, add forty clerks in all instead of twenty-five as the committee has done. I suggest that to the Senator. I know he does not want to go beyond the necessities of the Government.

Mr. PLUMB. The Surgeon-General says:

> I think fifty would be a very moderate estimate of the number that could be made practically useful.

He also says somewhere in this testimony, I do not now see it, that it is absolutely necessary to copy these records, and they are so badly worn that it will presently be impossible to use them at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator is right; but the Surgeon-General goes on copying them as things now exist, although, of course, the copying would be more rapid if he had more force. I suggest to the Senator that instead of twenty-five he add fifteen, which would make forty that this bill would give over and above what he has had heretofore.

Mr. PLUMB. If the committee are of opinion that forty will answer the purpose in the examination of these cases, and will take that responsibility, I am willing to accept that modification. I have no doubt that they have the same end in view that I have.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest to the Senator to strike out "sixty-five" and make it "eighty."

Mr. PLUMB. I will move to make the number eighty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 1305, the committee report to strike out "forty" and insert "sixty-five." It is moved to amend the amendment by striking out "sixty-five" and inserting "eighty;" so as to read:

> For eighty clerks, at $1,000 each, to be exclusively engaged in preparing and making reports to expedite the settlement of pension applications called for by the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. WITHERS. I simply want to call attention to the fact that the committee had before them the officers of these three bureaus for the purpose of eliciting from them the information that would enable them to arrive at a correct estimate of what addition might be necessary in their respective offices in order to facilitate the decision of pension cases, and upon the statements of these gentlemen to the committee the committee's report is based. The Senator from Kansas, who no doubt is much better informed than the committee or the heads of these bureaus, because in his judgment he thinks a very much larger number is required, proposed the other day to appropriate $200,000 for this object. The committee have reported a bill which will appropriate not less than $500,000 to it, and yet the Senator from Kansas insists on still increasing the number. For my part, I have nothing to say in the way of objection. The committee of which I am the chairman have investigated this matter, and in their judgment arrived at a conclusion which they thought would meet the difficulty, but it has met with such fierce opposition in the Senate that it seems to be regarded as an impracticable scheme; and now I for one am perfectly willing, while gentlemen who think differently and who are willing to trust to their own infallibility of judgment in this matter, to let them take the thing and run it for themselves.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no occasion for any heat about this matter. For the Senator from Virginia to intimate that I know more than the Appropriations Committee is hardly fair. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the statement that he made as a member of that committee and as a member of the Senate in the debate upon the amendment which I had the honor to offer to the pension appropriation bill. He said:

> I would merely call attention to the very anomalous procedure, as I conceive it to be, when a single Senator, on his own judgment of what is necessary and right, gets up in the Senate and moves to increase the clerical force in one of the Departments to an indefinite amount, fifty examiners with a large force of clerks in that Department, such force not being specified, when we had the assurance of the Commissioner of Pensions and the Secretary of the Interior that the increase of the clerical force made in that office a year ago was as much as could be utilized, and that no additional increase of force could add anything to the promptitude with which pension claims could be considered and determined.

That occurred on the 8th day of the present month. I think the testimony that was taken by the Committee on Appropriations has conclusively demonstrated that while the Senator from Kansas did not know any more than the Appropriations Committee, and did not know any more than the Commissioner of Pensions or the Secretary of the Interior, he had a little more facility in telling it; that was all.

Mr. ALLISON. I think there is no occasion for any special difference of opinion about this matter. I only want to say that the Committee on Appropriations in fixing the number of clerks for the Surgeon-General were guided somewhat by what the Commissioner of Pensions said to us after the interview with the Surgeon-General. On page 16 of this interview the chairman asked Commissioner Bentley—

> What you have stated to us about facilitating the examination in your office depends upon the Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices?
> Commissioner BENTLEY. Yes, sir; to some extent; but we are very far behind. We have got a great deal of work for these people to do without crowding the Surgeon-General or the Adjutant-General with inquiries. We have got all this work which lies behind; we have got, as you may say, 150,000 claims in the work, and the force have got something to do.

I merely call attention to this for the purpose of saying that the committee, after full examination of this whole testimony, thought twenty-five additional clerks would be enough for the Surgeon-General, but I think it is a wise thing to add fifteen more, and I think the fifteen additional clerks will enable the Surgeon-General to keep fully up with the business of the Pension Office.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1308, after the word "Pensions," to strike out "forty thousand" and insert "one assistant messenger, one watchman, and one laborer; in all, $67,000."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It will be necessary to change that sum by adding the increase made necessary by the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. ALLISON. It should be increased to $82,000. I move so to amend the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after the word "dollars," in line 1310, to insert:

And for the employment of twenty-five clerks, at the rate of $1,000 per annum each, for the like purpose, for the balance of the current fiscal year, and one assistant messenger, one watchman, and one laborer, $6,775, the latter sum to be immediately available.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend by making "twenty-five," in line 1311, "forty;" so as to read:

And for the employment of forty clerks, at the rate of $1,000 per annum each.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. The computation of the amount can be made and the proper sum inserted afterward.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Just add $5,000 to the amount and it will be right. Make the "$6,775" in line 1314 "$11,775." I move to amend the amendment in that way.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1319, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eight" and insert "eighteen;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to insert "$5,000 of which sum shall be available for the current fiscal year;" so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses, namely: Blank books, stationery, rent, fuel, gas, furniture, repairs, and incidentals, $18,000; $5,000 of which sum shall be available for the current fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1528, after the word "class," to strike out "three" and insert "four;" and in line 1529, after the word "thousand," to strike out "six" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

Judge-Advocate-General, United States Navy: For one clerk of class 4, one clerk at $1,000; in all, $2,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill to line 1577.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The committee direct me to say that in line 1577 the word "that" should be "a;" and in line 1579 the word "now" should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those changes will be made.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of Department of the Interior, in line 1582, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty;" in line 1585, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty;" in line 1586, after the word "dollars," to strike out "per year;" in line 1587, after "1881," to strike out "with the privilege for four years from" and insert "to;" and after "1882," in line 1589, to strike out "at the same rate, contingent upon the making by Congress of the necessary appropriation;" so as to make the clause read:

For the rent of a portion of the building on the northeast corner of Twelfth street and Pennsylvania avenue, Washington, District of Columbia, occupied by the Pension Office, or any other fire-proof building or buildings that the Secretary of the Interior may select, $20,000; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to contract with the owner of said building or other buildings for the rent thereof to the Government, at a rate not exceeding $20,000, from June 30, 1881, to June 30, 1882.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1590, to insert:

For rent for the accommodation of the additional clerical force provided for herein for the Pension Office, $8,000; $2,000 of which sum shall be available for the current fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1610, after the word "at," to strike out "eighteen hundred" and insert "two thousand;" and in line 1620, after the word "and," to strike out "eighty-seven thousand eight" and insert "eighty-eight thousand four;" so as to make the clause read:

General Land Office:

For the Commissioner of the General Land Office, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,000; law clerk, $2,000; recorder, $2,000; three principal clerks, at $2,000 each; sixteen clerks of class 4; thirty clerks of class 3; forty clerks of class 2; sixty-two clerks of class 1; thirty clerks, at $1,000 each; and fifteen copyists, at $900 each; one draughtsman, $1,600; one assistant draughtsman, $1,400; nine assistant messengers; twelve laborers; and six packers, at $720 each; in all, $288,420.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the appropriations for the Pension Office, in line 1657, to increase the appropriation for the compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions from $4,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after the word "dollars" in line 1657, to insert "first deputy commissioner, $4,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1659, to increase the appropriation for the compensation of deputy commissioner from $2,400 to $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1668, to increase the total amount of the appropriation for the compensation of the Commissioner of Pensions and the regular force employed in his office from $585,410 to $590,510.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1669, to insert:

For the following additional clerical force in the Pension Office, namely: Twenty examiners, at $2,000 each; twenty clerks of class 4; twenty clerks of class 3; twenty clerks of class 2; fifty clerks of class 1; three assistant messengers; three watchmen; and five laborers; in all, $203,620; and for the like force for the balance of the current fiscal year, $50,905; the latter sum to be immediately available.

Mr. LOGAN. While I was writing the amendment I desired to offer the Clerk was reading so fast that he has passed beyond the point. I ask the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to lines 1659 and 1660, which read:

Deputy commissioner, $2,500; chief clerk, $2,000; medical referee, $2,250.

I desire to amend that by adding:

For the surgeons assistant to the medical referee, $2,000 each.

In the law provision is made for one medical referee having a certain salary and for four assistants. He has but three assistants. They are all surgeons, medical men thoroughly versed in their profession, and they now get $1,800 each. Their duty in the Pension Office is to make examinations so far as rating pensioners is concerned, and it is a very laborious duty, they being examiners and medical experts. While you raise pension examiners to $2,000 it is nothing but right that these surgeons who are examiners for this purpose should be placed on an equal basis with them, and which would be $250 less than the medical referee's salary. I merely make the suggestion and offer the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be reported.

The SECRETARY. After the word "dollars," in line 1661, it is proposed to insert:

For surgeons assistant to medical referee, $2,000 each.

Mr. LOGAN. That increases the pay to equalize with that of examiners. Their pay is now $1,800.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator how are they provided for now? In line 1660 there is this item: "Medical referee, $2,500." The medical referee now gets $2,250.

Mr. LOGAN. That applies only to one person, and my amendment applies to the three surgeons who are his assistants. They are assistant medical referees.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In what part of the bill are they provided for? How are they designated? They must be called fourth-class clerks now, I suppose.

Mr. LOGAN. I have not the law here, but you will find by examination of the act of March 3, 1873, that it was provided that not more than four assistants to the medical referee should be in service. There are but three, and their business is to make examinations for the purpose of rating pensioners according to the disability.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator will notice that in the bill there is but one medical referee provided for; the others must be clerks; I do not know how else they can be designated. In the estimates they are not even referred to by the name the Senator uses. I ask the Senator to notice the bill where we give the additional force to the Pension Office; that we provide for twenty examiners, who will get $2,000 a year each. I have no doubt that these gentlemen he speaks of are now called fourth-class clerks, and get $1,800 a year. I suppose that must be the case. As we have the bill now, I take it that they can get and probably will get $2,000 for this reason: there are thirteen divisions there, as I understand, which ought to get some advance, and the committee have made the number twenty, thinking there were some other men in the office who might be advanced as well as the thirteen.

Mr. LOGAN. If it would be satisfactory, we may pass over this point, if I am allowed to reserve it until I make further examination; but I say to the Senator I am correct in reference to this thing.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think that is right.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that we may pass over the matter and have it reserved, so as not to go beyond it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Before the bill is reported to the Senate the Senator can call attention to it.

Mr. LOGAN. I will do that.

Mr. PLUMB. There is a difference between the pension law as it stands and the management of cases under that law which has given rise to the appropriations in this bill, of which that now under consideration is one.

A good deal has been said about the opinion of the Commissioner of Pensions in regard to the law and in regard to the necessity for a new law, and that opinion has been expressed on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere and has been potential, no doubt, in making up the minds of a great many persons that some new law was necessary. Taking the testimony of the Commissioner of Pensions before the Committee on Appropriations as evidencing his actual opinion and comparing it with statements made in his behalf here and elsewhere, I think it safe to say that he is the worst-quoted individual in the United States. On page 9 of this testimony, in response to a question by Senator WALLACE:

Supposing the Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices were supplied with all the clerical force needed to give you the information sought, what additional number of clerks could you advantageously work?

The Commissioner replies:

One hundred additional examiners immediately put in my office, those examiners to be men educated in law, familiar with handling evidence.

That is, as I understand it, more than double the force of the office, and that number he says he could advantageously use, and I suppose he knows what the meaning of the word "advantageously" is. I have no doubt he does; but that is not all. He goes on to say:

They could go into my office at once and be absorbed and made available, and after four months at least another hundred could be added with the proper complement of copyists, messengers, laborers, &c., and then it is possible that after these had become worked into the business another hundred might again be employed.

There the Commissioner says that under this much condemned law, under this system which it has been proposed to supplant with something that has been the subject of controversy here in the Senate, and after all that has been said about the absolute inability of the office to use any greater force at all, the Commissioner comes in and says that force can be multiplied by three to advantage and more than three, because to every examiner, according to the ratio laid down in this bill, there are five attendant clerks.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the Commissioner did not say that the additional force could not be used advantageously, because there was not room, nor conveniences, nor facilities?

Mr. PLUMB. It would be remarkable indeed——

Mr. PADDOCK. But if the room and facilities should be supplied for doing the work then the force could be used advantageously.

Mr. PLUMB. It would be very remarkable indeed if we were to overturn an entire system of administration simply because of lack of house-room. That is the first suggestion or hint that I have ever heard that that was one of the reasons for substituting the system proposed in Senate bill No. 496 for the present one. If the Senator from Nebraska bases his favor to that bill upon that suggestion, I have nothing to say.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am saying nothing whatever about that bill. I am speaking of the testimony to which the Senator refers in regard to the inability of the Commissioner to employ an additional force advantageously. In reference to the bill, I have made no expression whatever.

Mr. PLUMB. The Commissioner goes on to say:

I do not know what is the limit of the handling of these cases in the way of a correspondence. You know the correspondence is simply immense, and we have to handle cases over so many times. I do not know what would be the limit. I am sure that we could absorb two hundred examiners of the class I named, with the proper complement of copyists, &c.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. You stated, in answer to an inquiry by Senator WALLACE, that you could use immediately one hundred examiners, and after four months another hundred, and you said the compensation ought to be graded from $1,400 to $2,000, but you did not state the proportion of each class that you would need.

The Commissioner in answer to this question goes on, and in speaking, says:

I should say give me fifty two-thousand-dollar clerks, and leave the others to be governed by circumstances, as the Secretary of the Interior may direct. He would probably start a very considerable number of them at $1,400, and promote them as they became acquainted with the work and showed their efficiency.

Senator ALLISON. One-half of this number you say should be two-thousand-dollar clerks?

Commissioner BENTLEY. I am not speaking of the whole two hundred clerks.

Senator ALLISON. One-fourth of them, then?

Commissioner BENTLEY. I speak of the whole increase. I would make one-fourth of them two-thousand-dollar clerks, and leave the other grades in such a way that the Secretary might start them at $1,400, and grade them up.

On page 13 Commissioner Bentley, in response to a question by the chairman, says:

I have no doubt that in the claims that are now being prosecuted from 1862, if I were authorized by law to send out into the field where they are, the cases could be settled by an agent in two days' time in each particular case one way or the other. He would either see that the case had no merit, or he would ascertain the evidence which would give the man his pension.

There is something significant in that. Here are men whose cases have been pending in that office since 1862. The Commissioner says now that every one of those cases would have been decided in two days by the appointment of a man to go to the place where the applicant resides, and there examine into the case. Think of the disgrace of the Government that has ensued in the last nineteen years while these people have been waiting for pensions, because the Government has not authorized men to go and spend two days in the places where the claimants live for the purpose of determining whether or not they were entitled to pensions. I do not say anything about who is responsible. I am glad that the first steps have been taken to remove the responsibility at least from Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. As you desire to examine cases such as you have indicated, would it not be best to ask for the force you wanted in your office, and then when you wished to send a man out you would have the authority to do so without specially having the appropriation made for that purpose?

Commissioner BENTLEY. That is what I would do; but it would require an amendment to a section of the Revised Statutes to permit me to use such a force. I have to send a number of men out to smell out frauds. I myself do not recommend it at all, because it is an offensive way to deal with things, but I have to send them out to make inquiries and ascertain the truth in cases. I would amend the section of the Revised Statutes by striking out the words "suspected attempts at fraud" and insert "investigate pension cases."

Senator WALLACE. It would be a valuable addition to the ex parte system, you think, to have a man make inquiry on the ground?

Commissioner BENTLEY. Yes, sir.

And I ask the attention of the Senate, after the debate we have had about frauds, to the remainder of this answer:

It would protect the Government in the administration of the affairs of the office; and, if it did not, I think the Commissioner himself would be at fault.

One little amendment to the existing system, striking out three words and inserting three others, is all that is necessary to protect the Government from fraud, or if any frauds are to exist after that amendment, they are because the Commissioner himself does not do his duty. That is a thing which might have been done, I imagine, a long time ago, and we need not have spent days and days here in debating whether we would substitute a new and untried system for the one we have when we could have supplied all that was needed by making a little amendment of the existing law, which is now to be made in this appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Would you not arrive at the same end to leave the statute just as it stands, and provide here in this bill that the Commissioner is authorized to send out an agent or clerk to investigate pension cases, without doing anything with that section?

Commissioner BENTLEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Just to say that the Commissioner of Pensions shall have power to detail a clerk to examine into pension cases.

Commissioner BENTLEY. That is it.

The CHAIRMAN. And leave the statute just as it is?

Commissioner BENTLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. He gives the same conclusion I did.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes; and further:

Senator WALLACE. You wish to employ one hundred and twenty-five clerks in addition to what you named and in addition to what are provided for in the bill?

Commissioner BENTLEY. If you are going to settle the cases that are in my office promptly, that is required.

Then on page 15:

Senator WALLACE. And if a force is given to you to settle more cases and have them ready for payment, as a matter of course it follows that you must have the money appropriated also to pay those additional cases which are settled?

Commissioner BENTLEY. You will appreciate, Senator, the character of this addition when I tell you that I shall expect to settle with this additional force three cases where I now settle one.

Senator ALLISON. In other words, it would about treble your power of settlement.

Commissioner BENTLEY. Yes, sir; but if you gave me a special agent force as I have estimated, that will reflect back again very speedily. I regard that force as a very important element in this business.

The committee have not done all that the Commisioner asked; and yet after what was said here about the fact that we had no estimate from the Commissioner, and about the entire willingness to give everything the Commissioner should ask, I wonder that they stopped short of what he said was desirable, if not necessary. I wonder that they have not offered a provision for three hundred examiners, which the Commissioner says he could advantageously use. What they have reported is a step in the right direction and good as far as it goes, but it illustrates how much truth can be got out by a little inquiry. Somebody has been making a very great mistake heretofore. Somebody has been unnecessarily delaying the settlement of pension cases. Somebody is fearfully responsible for the delay, and for the suffering attendant upon it and for the gross wrong which has been visited by means of it upon the most deserving class of people there is upon the soil of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that there are only twenty examiners named as such of these clerks, and clerks of class 1 were included in the idea of the Commissioner of Pensions. In other words, we gave him one hundred instead of two hundred.

Mr. PLUMB. I did not rise for the purpose of complaining of the Appropriations Committee. I am willing to concede that in making an addition of this kind to the force it is better to do it by successive steps. It is better to put in what you can readily absorb, assimilate, and make available to the highest degree of efficiency. Therefore I regard this step on the part of the Appropriations Committee as really on the whole fairly meeting the case, but I still think what we have before us to-day is only what we can see should have been done five years ago.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let me say in justice to the Commissioner of Pensions that he stated, and it is in his evidence—I suppose the Senator has overlooked it—that at no time until the present could this force have been increased, until within a very short time. Why? Because the copying of the records had not taken place until very recently, and it was impossible to increase perhaps within even thirty days from the fact that the copying had not been completed; but they can now have duplicates to work in different directions. Three different sets of persons can go to work on the same rolls where one person had to be confined to them heretofore. In addition to that, the Commissioner said to the committee, and probably it is in his evidence, if we increase to the full amount that he spoke of you had better recall your pension appropriation bill and insert, instead of $50,000,000, vote $100,000,000 for the next year. I have no doubt $75,000,000 will be wanted next year for pensions and arrears. If the appropriation were doubled it would have to be $100,000,000.

Mr. PLUMB. There are two things which I have no doubt have been the occasion of a great deal of delay. One of them has been intimated rather than stated by the Senator from West Virginia when he spoke of the amount of money necessary to pay the pensions. I have had some reason to believe that there has been a disposition in certain quarters to impede the payment of pensions because the prompt payment of those obligations might interfere with some of the financial operations of the Government, whatever they may be. The other is the suggestion that all the while there are frauds being committed upon the Government in the allowance of pension claims, and that has been spoken of as something which inhered in the system, and consequently Congress has been granting facilities grudgingly, because the system was supposed to be vicious, and that at least 10 per cent. of all the money we appropriated was fraudulently paid out, and that therefore it was not wise to extend the facilities for increased allowances and increased payments until we could have some other system to prevent the frauds. And here is the Commissioner of Pensions, who is the sole and only authority that I have ever heard of for the allegations of fraud upon the Government in regard to pensions, coming in and stating that a little amendment in the verbiage of the existing law is all that is necessary to enable him to prevent frauds upon the Government in the matter of pensions.

I fear, Mr. President, that unless we had had the debate on the amendment which I offered to the pension appropriation bill a few days ago, many thousands of men would not only have gone this year but the next year, and many other years as well, without that which the Government owes them, and I call attention to this now for the purpose of enforcing the idea which I have expressed, that every Senator on this floor is himself under responsibility in regard to every department of this Government for which money is appropriated, and that we cannot shirk that responsibility by saying that some one, the creature of the laws we pass, the man whom we set up and the man that we can put down, who simply spends the money we give him, says that on the whole he does not think that as a matter of public policy or as a matter of discretion the department of which he is the head cannot use any more money properly.

I propose in reference to this as in other things to assume my own share of the responsibility and not hide myself in regard to the exercise of that responsibility behind the acts of omission or commission of any person in the Government, whether he be the Commissioner of Pensions or any one else. It is now definitely shown to the convincing of the Appropriations Committee, and of the Senate, and of the country, that the law did not need to be supplanted in order that this business might move more rapidly; that the law did not need to be even seriously amended in order that the Government might be protected against fraud; and all that was needed was a trifling amendment, to use the language of the Commissioner himself, and the addition of the clerical force which the people who pay the taxes have been perfectly willing for these many years to pay, even if it occasioned additional burdens in the shape of taxation.

Mr. WALLACE. We simply have the statement of the Commissioner of Pensions that this system will work out the result which we hope it will. We may be mistaken as he may be mistaken in regard to results; all that we can do is to give the force. I have done the best I could in the committee to aid in giving him the force to work out the end. I say in no spirit of fault-finding that many cases which have been on file since 1862 have been improperly held there simply because the Commissioner of Pensions had no power to send to the locality to investigate the facts surrounding them. They have been held there by invitation of persons in the vicinity.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, he is certainly mistaken; the law authorizes the sending of persons anywhere in the United States.

Mr. WALLACE. To investigate frauds?

Mr. LOGAN. To do anything; to ascertain whether a party is entitled to a pension.

Mr. PLUMB. If a case is held up after the proof is perfect, for what cause is it held up? Because the Commissioner suspects that there is fraud in it, and in section 474 of the Revised Statutes and the corresponding sections in the pension act it is provided:

SEC. 474. The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to detail, from time to time, any of the clerks in his office to investigate any suspected attempts to defraud the United States, in or affecting the administration of any law relative to pensions, and to aid in prosecuting any person implicated, with such additional compensation as is customary in cases of special service. Any person so detailed shall have the power to administer oaths in the course of any such investigation.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator surely will see that the Commissioner must have a prima facie case of fraud before he acts by sending out a person to investigate it.

Mr. PLUMB. But when he holds up a case after the proof is perfect, must he not do that upon some suspicion of fraud or some other improper thing connected with it? Or for what reason does he hold it up?

Mr. WALLACE. The proof might be perfect and yet the Commissioner not be satisfied that the pension ought to be granted. There are thousands of cases of just that character, and it is to that point, it seems to me, that this amendment to the bill goes. So far as the power of the Commissioner is concerned, I know nothing except what he has said himself; and the Senator from Illinois will understand me as stating just what the Commissioner of Pensions stated, that he had not power to send abroad agents to examine into pension cases except where he suspected fraud. If he had not, then it is certainly time we should give him that power. The Commissioner of Pensions himself, the Department of the Interior, and the authority surrounding his bureau have deprived him of the power to do what it is said he now has the power to do. If the whole responsibility has been upon him in the past and he had the power to do it and he has the power to do it now, under what degree of responsibility is he to-day?

Mr. PLUMB. The Commissioner of Pensions, it is true, is the person who is responsible in one sense for the amendments which the committee have offered to this bill; and he has been responsible as well, if he has been properly quoted on this floor and elsewhere, for the statement that the present law was wholly inadequate to enable him to check fraud, and that it not only was not adequate, but that nothing but a new system would answer the purpose. If he was good enough authority for one, he ought to be good enough authority for the other.

But, Mr. President, we as members of the Senate have known, as everybody in the country has known, that there has been a clog in the administration of affairs in that office. There has been a variety of causes assigned for this. Some people thought there was not enough force; some that there was not sufficient brains at the head of the force; some that the system was wrong; but the fact that something was wrong and that through the means of that wrong an outrage was being committed on a meritorious class of people no one has denied or doubted. It therefore was incumbent and has been incumbent upon Congress ever since that state of facts has become notorious to inquire what was necessary to be done, and to do something in order that that wrong might be corrected; and that is a responsibility which cannot be put upon the Commissioner of Pensions.

Now, failing to do something to supplant a system which is not commending itself to the judgment of the Senate, the question is what else should be done; and when the proposition was made that the force should be increased it was said here by the defenders of the Commissioner and by the advocates of that bill that it was entirely useless to increase the force of the office, because it could not properly be used under the system as it existed. When the tender was made that the committee should examine the Commissioner and all other persons supposed to know anything about it, the doubt I had in my mind as to the propriety of yielding to that was that I believed the Commissioner had been properly quoted, and that he would still say, as it was stated here he had already said, that he could not use any more force, and we should therefore be brought face to face with a difficulty which the Senate would not care to unlock or would not care to evade by the proposition I made. But to my great surprise the Commissioner comes in and not only says that the $200,000 which I wanted to give in order to make the law effective can be properly used, but he multiplies that by five and says he can use three hundred examiners where I only proposed to give fifty, a corresponding number of copyists and penmen; and thus we have got to the bottom of this matter so far as concerns the question of what the Commissioner can do under the present law, and that was the thing about which we contended here for two days.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator before he proceeds allow me to make a suggestion as to the amendment I proposed? The law that I called the attention of the chairman to is this:

SEC. 4776. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint a duly qualified surgeon as medical referee, who, under the control and direction of the Commissioner of Pensions, shall have charge of the examination and revision of the reports of examining surgeons, and such other duties touching medical and surgical questions in the Pension Office as the interests of the service may demand; and his salary shall be $2,500 per annum. And the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized to appoint such qualified surgeons (not exceeding four) as the exigencies of the service may require, who may perform the duties of examining surgeons when so required, and who shall be borne upon the rolls as clerks of the fourth class; but such appointments shall not increase the clerical force of said bureau.

The three surgeons that are in addition to the medical referee are now borne on the rolls as fourth-class clerks, although they are assistant medical referees. As I stated, their duties are to examine all questions of rating pensioners on account of wounds or disease or disability; and it is a very arduous task they have to perform. You give the medical referee $2,250 by this bill; you give the examiners 2,000 each; and these three medical examiners who are employed are rated at $1,800. They are very important officers in this Department, and certainly their services are such that their pay, with the others, ought to be increased to $2,000. They ought to be put on an equality with all other examiners. The other examiners merely examine the papers and see whether the evidence is sufficient, while these examiners examine the medical testimony to see the rating of the pensioner. They are all examiners, but you leave these three at $1,800 and put the others at $2,000. I think it is right to put them all on an equality; and hence I propose the amendment that the assistants, as they are styled in the law already, the assistant medical examiners shall have a salary of $2,000 each. I cannot see that there can be any objection to that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. I decline to be further interrupted.

Mr. LOGAN. I will say——

Mr. BLAIR. I have only a few words to say.

Mr. LOGAN. I would add to the amendment I before stated—

His assistants, $2,000 each, instead of being rated as fourth-class clerks as heretofore.

That will explain it so that it will be perfectly understood to whom it refers.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, I am not charged with the defense of the Commissioner of Pensions; I have no intention to undertake it; and if any Senator has anything to say by way of a charge, open or covert, against the Commissioner, he may find other defenders than myself; not that I fail to believe him to be, as I said the other day, a very honest and competent gentleman, and any administration, as I then took occasion to observe, will be extremely fortunate that finds his superior or his equal as a successor. But I am not among those who believe, however necessary it may be to make this additional appropriation in order that something may be done, that it is the judicious and proper thing to be done for the good of the country or of the applicants for pensions. I am very glad to see it done, however. I am willing to see $10,000,000, or any sum of money whatever, wasted, or fifty per cent. of it wasted, or so much of it as it may be necessary to waste, in order that a portion of it may be expended to the advantage of this class of suffering claimants in this country. It is, under the circumstances, perhaps the only thing that can be done.

It is very late in the session. It is doubtful whether any general legislation on this subject can pass both branches of Congress. If those who believe that a modification of the system under which pension claims are presented is needed should incline to take especial advantages of those who hold to the sufficiency of the present law, if they saw fit to pursue precisely the same course in this case which was pursued the other day by those who are opposed to what is known as the Bentley bill, and to raise points of order in regard to the modification of the pension law, even now the thing could be done; for, Mr. President, the Senate will observe that if we could make the same point of order which was made the other day by the Senator from Illinois that in these lines from 1680 to 1683 there is a modification of existing law, there is new legislation improper upon an appropriation bill. Some of this money may be employed in local examinations of pension cases, not of cases which have been once rated and are upon the roll, but of the pending applications. If we made a point of order on this provision even now, nothing could be done. I know as a friend of soldiers, and not their peculiar guardian angel either, but simply as one who has some sympathy with them, the necessity for some action. Entertaining for these poor, suffering soldiers and defenders of the country a profound sympathy, I will waive the privilege which I could have exerted, and I will not raise any point of order. I am glad to see this modification of the existing law upon an appropriation bill, and money even wasted, although a little of it perhaps will do good to the soldier.

It is said that there is no fault in the law. Let the Commissioner of Pensions take care of himself and let us deal with the law alone. The Senator from Kansas complains that for fifteen years soldiers and widows have been begging of the justice of the Government the adjudication of their claims, and he strongly intimates and asserts that there is a great fault somewhere. He strongly intimates that it may be with the head of the office; but the present Commissioner has been at the head of that office only five years or about that, and here claims have been pending for fifteen years. Who is to blame for the fact that ten years prior to that time those claims failed to be adjudicated? We have had half a dozen different Commissioners of Pensions; they have been strong sympathizers with the soldier as a rule. Can it be possible that there was no defect in the operation of the law? These claims, so we are now told, can be adjudicated in two days if proper facilities are afforded for their examination; but for ten years with men who were as friendly to the soldier as anybody who speaks from a seat in the Senate now or ever has they have remained unadjudicated. Can this be so and there be no fault in the law?

Mr. President, I think there is a fault in the law. These additional appropriations which are being made will lessen the aggregate of the evil in the country; but they are unwise appropriations in my belief. I think smaller appropriations, with such modifications of our system of examination as might very readily be made if points of order would not be interjected and raised upon us even at this late hour of the session, would accomplish four times the work.

Now, sir, in the very nature of things this system must be wrong in some respects. Here are 300,000 great cases of claims against the Government of the United States pending, some in every congressional district of the United States, and in those districts where most of the soldiers reside you find to-day fifteen hundred to two thousand of them, and they involve, on the average, an expenditure to the Government, considering the probable lifetime of the pensioner, of from $1,000 to $3,000, and many a much larger sum. In my belief, the cases which make up the litigation of the country do not involve one-fourth part the amount which is involved in the average pension claim. We investigate all those cases; we adjudge them finally for the United States or against the United States, for the pensioner or against him, on ex parte testimony taken in a way oftentimes so unreliable that it would not be admitted even in the most ordinary and trivial affair in the court of a justice of the peace. We admit ex parte testimony, taken under the most unfavorable circumstances, and we adjudicate millions every year against the United States, and sometimes against the pensioner, on testimony of this kind.

Why not apply the principles of the common law? Why not apply the principles upon which we investigate causes in equity? Why not appoint in every congressional district in the United States—not one, for I say one man could perform only a very slight portion of the labor to be done—but four, or five, or six, or ten it may be, examiners, if you please to call them so, men learned in the law, young men, vigorous men, who can bring to the duty good intellectuality and good professional capacity also. In the early period of their practice the services of such men can be obtained at a comparatively slight salary. One thousand dollars, or $1,500, or $2,000 will command as good professional capacity as five, or six, or ten years later in professional life cannot be obtained for five, or six, or eight thousand dollars.

This is not only what has been done in the past, but it is a system which we are to pursue in the future, and the amount of money which has been paid in the past is only a tithe of what we are to pay hereafter on pension adjudications. Three hundred thousand cases are now pending, and they are coming in at the rate of 20,000 a year; coming in as fast as we are going to settle them. As we go on, as the men who have done service for their country in the field grow older, we are likely to modify our laws, as we have done hitherto, and we shall give in their old age to these soldiers undoubtedly pensions, which are mere gratuities, pensions which may become necessary for the aged, the feeble, the infirm, when these disabilities were not contracted in the service, so that the same modification of the law favorable to those who have done service in the recent war will be likely to give us an accumulation of claims for the next twenty-five or thirty years rather than otherwise.

Now, sir, we are at the threshold of a great difficulty, and it does seem to me that although in the present Congress probably nothing can be done, we ought not to push this matter aside on the supposition that there is no defect in the law, and that no better method of investigating and adjudicating these claims can possibly be devised by the wit of man.

We could find men such as I have indicated in every congressional district; and we could send those men to the pensioner. I do not believe in the provisions of the bill which was discussed the other day, limited as they were, because in every congressional district there are to-day as many as twenty men busily engaged in getting up this same sort of testimony which is to be had, which is so unreliable that, as I said the other day, the Pension Office has become simply an organized suspicion, and at least a third of its personnel ought to be eliminated, and of those remaining even the best examiners who are there will tell you, when they tell you the thing honestly, as many of them have told me, that they have become so accustomed to learning that this testimony which they gaze upon, collected as it is, is unreliable, that they never know whether to allow a case which is thoroughly proved or not. Whenever they have to allow a case, unless it depends upon the records of the Government, they are always suspicious, no matter how fully it may be proven, that they are allowing a fraud.

On the other hand, if the pensioner is honest, but if his attorney has failed to prepare his testimony as it properly should have been, no matter how good his claim if his testimony appears to be somewhat defective, they reject it as a matter of course. Thus oftentimes fraud succeeds, because a claim is presented that is apparently good, while an honest claimant, from the failure properly to present his case, is defeated in his claim. The result of it all is that these men, never seeing anything but written testimony, never coming in contact with the witnesses, never seeing the claimant at all, lacking that great test of the reliability of testimony which a jury have when a witness is confronted eye to eye with the foreman and his associates, come to be an organized suspicion, and the best cases are rejected, or when they do not reject them—for ordinarily these men sympathize with the soldier—they hang them up, and they hang year after year until death comes in and settles the question. That is the difficulty with these ten and fifteen year old cases that my friend from Kansas talks about.

Put a man in the locality with mental capacity, with legal training, and tell him that if he acts upon testimony of this kind every time that he is adjudicating for or against these parties he is deciding on an amount anywhere from $1,000 to $15,000, and he will hesitate. I do not think there is much fraud; of course no such amount of fraud as has been talked about. I believe that these claims are the most honest claims in the whole country, and I believe whoever asserts the contrary simply defames the men whose blood and whose valor and whose sacrifices give us to-day the opportunity of legislating upon their claims one way or the other. But nevertheless with testimony taken as it is, it would be impossible for my astute friend to discern, to judge whether to believe or to disbelieve the testimony which might be under his eye. But that is the only testimony that can be taken according to law. He says and others have said that under the law as it now exists investigations can be made. So they can be made. I am not familiar with the text of the law, but this I know has been the construction of it for fifteen years: that investigations were not to be made by the pension agents unless the claim had been once allowed, and then, there being suspicion of fraud, substantial evidence of fraud, the Pension Office has authority to send its investigator into the neighborhood, and that investigator as a rule has been a man who was sent out for the purpose of doing something for the Government. If he came back and did not report against the pensioner he had accomplished nothing, his journey had been a failure, and he probably would not be likely to go again. That I know has been very largely the principle on which these men have acted. I recollect now an instance where some years ago, upon a mere suspicion of a letter to the Commissioner of Pensions of an irresponsible fellow who subsequently confessed on his dying bed that he did it from malevolence, a claim was suspended, and after eight or ten years of effort the pensioner was at last restored to the roll. There were six other pensions discontinued at the same time upon this same letter in the same immediate neighborhood, and one after another they gradually found their way back on to the roll, every one of them having been dropped upon the report of one of the special agents, and yet when justice was done those names were put back.

Sir, the investigations that are spoken of are investigations of that character, and I have never known any other under the law as it is. Suppose that you should appoint impartial men, appoint them upon the nomination of the President, if you please, and on confirmation by the Senate for these offices, so much more important than those of the officials who have taken the census for the present year; suppose you appoint them by some power whose supervision will leave them in the attitude of judges, not responsible, it may be, to the Pension Office or to the Secretary of the Interior, but placed in the attitude of judges or of commissioners to ascertain the facts, would not that be an improvement? After such commissioners had taken the testimony in their respective districts, and after what was not within their own jurisdiction had been taken by a corresponding officer in some other jurisdiction and forwarded to them, let them examine that testimony and find the facts, and let the facts be reported to the Pension Office as making a prima facie case, and let the adjudication go upon that unless there was some evidence arising afterward which would justify the Commissioner in overruling these examiners or judges. This is my idea.

There is another thing. A prominent official in the Pension Office has told me within the course of the last two or three weeks that a very large proportion of these claims could be readily adjudicated if the Government itself would furnish to the claimant the evidence in its own possession. The War Department and it may be other Departments have this evidence, but it is thought if they keep the record evidence to themselves it may be impossible or difficult for the applicant to supply it; he may be wrong in a date, he may be wrong this way, that way, or the other, and finally when he puts in his secondary evidence they may entrap him by what they have on file. Protracted efforts to establish the claim take place, and it finally fails because of the contradiction between the records here and this attempt to supply secondary evidence. I say if any abuse of that kind does exist, and I think it does exist to some extent, it is the duty of the Government to furnish the applicant in the first instance with whatever evidence is in its possession.

These men went into the field; they did not keep records themselves; they did not foresee this matter of the pension laws and their efforts to get their dues from the Government ten, fifteen, or twenty years after. The Government keeps records. It does seem to me that it is a fraud on the part of the nation itself toward these men that its sworn officials, those having control of its Departments and in possession of this important testimony, do not only fail to furnish such records to the Commissioner of Pensions particularly, but fail to furnish them to the applicant himself so that he may know what testimony it is necessary for him to supply from secondary sources.

There certainly ought to be a change in the pension law to reach cases like that; and there are a great many other alterations of equal significance to those which I have suggested which ought to be made in the law and are going to be made. We cannot go on spending so much money for the administration of the pension system without making some change in the method of investigating these cases. I tell you, Mr. President, and I tell the Senate and the country, that, in my judgment, unless we do adjudicate these cases in such a way that the country shall be satisfied that it is paying out its money rightfully, there is great danger to the entire pension system itself; and that man, whatever may be his motives, is no true friend of the soldiers of this country who is not willing to co-operate in some effort at least to secure a modification of the existing method of investigating these claims for pensions and for bounties as well.

As I said before, it is no province of mine to defend the Commissioner of Pensions, and I do not propose to do it. I do know, however, that he has not been quoted here as he has taken pains to express himself to me. I understood that there was some part of a letter from him or testimony by him before the Appropriations Committee, in which he had "gone back," as we express ourselves, upon the representations which he had given in his report to the country. I called on him last Saturday and he showed me a letter——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will my friend there allow me to say that the Commissioner of Pensions stated—which I mentioned on the floor to-day—that until this time the force could not have been increased in his office from the fact that he had not duplicates of the rolls, so as to allow two or more examiners to examine them at the same time. So I do not think he made a misstatement on that point.

Mr. BLAIR. As I say, in this war on the Commissioner of Pensions, I do not care to meddle. Senators may have their fight with the Commissioner in any way they see fit; I am only talking in reference to what I think to be a serious fault in the law itself and in reference to the good of the country and in reference to the good of the soldier at large.

Mr. GARLAND. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment to make a motion that, if we are to have a night session, we take a recess now?

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senate will be willing that I shall take three or four minutes more now, I will not trouble the Senate any more on this subject.

Mr. GARLAND. I do not desire to cut the Senator off at all, but the hour is getting late.

Mr. BLAIR. I give way, then.

Mr. GARLAND. I move that the Senate take a recess.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment.

Mr. GARLAND. Yes, sir.

COURTS IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. ROLLINS. I ask to have a bill laid before the Senate that we may have concurrence in the amendment of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 21, 1881.

Resolved, That the bill (S. No. 1292) to provide for the removal of the terms of the United States circuit and district courts now held at Exeter, for and within the district of New Hampshire, to the city of Concord do pass with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the terms of the United States circuit and district courts now held at Exeter, for and within the district of New Hampshire, be, and the same hereby shall be, held at Concord in said district."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not see how this supersedes an appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asked unanimous consent that the bill received from the House of Representatives be now considered and the amendment concurred in.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know that I am at all opposed to that bill; but I should like to look into it, because I know that the Senator from Vermont takes some interest in that measure. It is a bill to change the courts in New Hampshire from Exeter to Concord.

Mr. ROLLINS. That is it; and there is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not know the bill had passed the Senate at all. It had better lie over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the order under the rule.

Mr. GARLAND. I now move that the Senate take a recess.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask a question of the Chair before that motion is put.

Mr. GARLAND. I yield.

Mr. THURMAN. Do I understand that both Senators from New Hampshire are in favor of that bill?

Mr. ROLLINS. They are.

Mr. BLAIR. I am in favor of any bill my colleague is in favor of.

Mr. ROLLINS. There is no objection to the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be again laid before the Senate. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

RECESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. GARLAND.]

Mr. VOORHEES. In order to avoid any surprise or misunderstanding this evening, I desire to appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for an understanding that when we meet here after the recess the appropriation bill now under consideration may be laid aside in order that the Library bill may be taken up to-night. I make this announcement in order to avoid any surprise that might take place if the bill was taken up without his knowledge.

Mr. CONKLING. Taken up with a view to action in the Senate?

Mr. VOORHEES. With a view to action; yes, sir.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. In the absence of the Senator from Virginia who has charge of what is called the cattle bill, I do not wish any action to be taken that would displace it. It was laid aside, I understand, informally under an agreement to take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It cannot be taken up to-night because the amendment is not printed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I understand that, but I do not want such action taken to-night on other bills as will place it out of its present position. I wish to know that the cattle bill is left in the position that it would occupy if we did not take a recess, by moving to take it up now and laying it aside again informally for the appropriation bill.

Mr. ROLLINS. If we simply take a recess, it will be left just in the condition it is now.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. What is the ruling of the Chair on that point?

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall call for the Calendar when the Senate meets after the recess in pursuance of the resolution that gives us an evening session.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then I move that the cattle bill be taken up, so that it may be the unfinished business for to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has already been recognized, and has submitted a motion that the Senate take a recess until half-past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will not the Senator allow me to make the motion I have indicated?

Mr. GARLAND. What is the motion? I did not hear it.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That we take up the cattle bill, so that it may have its proper place according to the position it occupied this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would advise the Senator from Iowa that a recess will not displace the cattle bill under the understanding of the Senate. It is only an adjournment that does that.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Then that is the understanding of the Senate.

Mr. THURMAN. My friend from Iowa does not help the matter at all by taking up the cattle bill, for the session to-night is a part of the day's session. If he wants the cattle bill up to-morrow he must attend here to-night, and get it up at the close of the session to-night. Nothing is made by taking it up now.

Mr. GARLAND. I insist on the motion for a recess.

Mr. CONKLING. Pending that motion I wish as so much advice has been given to the Senator from Iowa to remind him that unless he has his cattle bill taken up and laid before the Senate before the adjournment to-night, the cattle bill will be where he cannot reach it.

Mr. GARLAND. I insist on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Before that motion is put I wish to have a distinct understanding with the Senate on this other matter. The Senator from Virginia who has charge of the cattle bill is not here. I know he feels a deep interest in it, and I do not suppose any Senator desires that any advantage shall be taken of the rules of order in his absence. Now if it be the clear understanding of the Senate, assented to by the Senate unanimously, that the cattle bill shall not lose its place, then I am content to try that again.

Mr. GARLAND. That bill is not in the Senate; it has gone to the Printer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas, that the Senate now take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and ten minutes) the Senate took a recess till seven and a half o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The hour of half past seven having arrived, the Senate resumes its session for the purpose of considering cases on the Calendar under the order adopted on the 16th instant. The Clerk will report the first case on the Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. THEODORE F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (S. No. 1349) for enlarging the City Hall for the accommodation of the courts and records of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1280) to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, relating to suits at law affecting the title to mining claims;

A bill (H. R. No. 1319) to reorganize the judicial system of the Territory of Montana; and

A bill (H. R. No. 440) for the ascertaiment of the amount due the Choctaw Nation.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 3047) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to recommend a proper site for a union railroad depot in the city of Washington, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 1728) granting a pension to Mrs. Lelia E. McCauley;

A bill (S. No. 1004) for the relief of the sureties of Henry L. Norvell; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 386) for printing report of the Life-Saving Service.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. ROLLINS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2209) authorizing underground electric wires within the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. COCKRELL submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1280) to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, relating to suits at law affecting the title to mining claims, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 1319) to reorganize the judicial system of the Territory of Montana was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 440) for the ascertainment of the amount due the Choctaw Nation, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

Mr. VOORHEES. I rise to move to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of then moving to proceed to the consideration of the Library bill. The pending order, I suppose, is the Calendar under the resolution on which we are holding a night session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. MORRILL. I presume it was the general understanding that the Library bill was to come up, with the assent of all or nearly every member of the Senate?

Mr. HARRIS. There was certainly no such general understanding. The Senator from Indiana gave notice that he would call that bill up this evening, and to the extent of that notice, of course, the Senate is advised that the Senator from Indiana desires its consideration; but it is unquestionably a matter for the Senate to determine as to whether they will proceed to consider the Library bill or the Calendar, and for myself, I must say I am for the Calendar as against that bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations had the right of way, and it was understood, so far as such understandings can be made, with his assent that he would not press the appropriation bill at the session to-night. I therefore make the motion I do, to postpone the Calendar for the purpose of then moving to take up the consideration of the Library building bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the pending order be postponed.

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for a division.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will not ask for a division; we shall have to wait.

Mr. HARRIS. I will not demand a division, though really I think we ought to go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The demand for a division is withdrawn. The ayes have it, and the pending order is postponed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1988) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that a fire-proof building for the accommodation of the Library of Congress shall be erected on reservation numbered thirty-five of the public grounds, known as Judiciary Square; and the construction of the building, according to the plan adopted by the Joint Select Committee on additional accommodations for the Library of Congress, shall be in charge of a commission composed of the Secretary of the Interior, the Architect of the Capitol Extension, and the Librarian of Congress; and it appropriates $1,500,000 to commence the construction of the building.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I have no speech to make. I believe this subject is very well understood. It ought to be. It has been agitated with the knowledge of the necessity of such a building for the last thirteen years, and for the last eight years there has been an annual appropriation and an annual waste of public money for the purpose of investigating the subject and arriving at some conclusion. I believe if the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman has done nothing else, it has so brought this matter to the attention of the Senate that every Senator has informed himself upon the subject. I shall content myself with asking the Secretary to read the report of the committee. That will be all that I desire to lay before the Senate. I could not add anything to it. It is a report which has been carefully considered, and which in my judgment covers the whole ground. I ask the Secretary to read the report to page 8, which embraces the report proper and which is the report of the majority of the committee, and after that I shall ask him to read the views of the minority presented by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] a member of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The Secretary will read the report.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the report be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. VOORHEES, from the the Select Committee on accommodations for the Library of Congress, January 14, 1881:

The select committee of both Houses of Congress, appointed under "An act to provide additional accommodations for the Library of Congress," approved June 8, 1880, having fully considered the subject referred to them, submit the following as their report:

On the question of practicable and beneficial changes of the Capitol building for the better accommodation of the Houses of Congress, with improvements in light, ventilation, &c., therein, the committee conclude that while improvements might probably be made in these respects in the existing edifice, yet the overruling importance and immediate necessity of providing for the Library demands the first attention at the hands of Congress.

The joint committee, as authorized by law, appointed three persons of known skill and attainments as architects to examine and report to the committee in detail as to the space within the Capitol, and as to the expediency of enlarging that building for the accommodation of the Library and for other purposes. The committee requested the architects, Messrs. Edward Clark, Alex. R. Esty, and J. L. Smithmeyer, to report upon the matters referred to them, instructing each to submit his own plans for an enlargement of the Capitol, if that were deemed expedient for Library accommodation, or for a separate building for the Library, if they should agree that this was indispensable. The architects reported that they had agreed unanimously upon the following as the expression of their views on the matter referred to them:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this commission it is inexpedient if not impracticable to extend the Capitol building so as to provide additional space for the rapid growth of the Library without seriously interfering with the architectural proportions thereof, and also its conveniences for legislative purposes, but that 'practical and beneficial' changes, such as mentioned in the act creating this board, can and should be made at no distant day in and of the Capitol for the better accommodation of the two houses of Congress. We therefore recommend the erection of a separate edifice for the Library.

"Very respectfully submitted.

"EDWARD CLARK.
"ALEX. R. ESTY.
"J. L. SMITHMEYER.

"WASHINGTON, D. C., September 25, 1880."

This unanimous joint report was accompanied by individual reports from each of the architects, with plans and drawings for a separate Library building, and a part of the commission of architects added suggestions regarding desirable improvements in the Capitol building which should afford better ventilation, light, space, and adequate support to the dome.

These papers of the commission of architects are herewith submitted as an appendix to this report.

The joint select committee, having carefully in view all the objects embraced in the act providing for their appointment, have held many conferences, and given personal examination to the condition of the Library, to its past and prospective rate of growth, and to the possibilities of providing for its continuance permanently or for a long term of years within the Capitol. The result of the committee's deliberations is the conclusion, in which they are unanimous, that the erection of a separate building to contain the Library and its copyright department, is an immediate necessity. And while the committee are of the opinion that some changes may sooner or later be effected in the Capitol building for its improvement, they deem it their duty at this time, under the grave public emergency of saving from risk and injury the great collection of books which are the property of the Government, to recommend the postponement of the controverted questions regarding the legislative halls. The reasons which have had weight with the committee in reaching this conclusion are briefly these:

1. No enlargement of the Capitol which would be agreed to as desirable, either by experts in architecture or by the majority of Congress, could possibly afford more than a very few years' accommodation to the Library. It would now fill completely, if properly shelved, either of the two wings occupied by the Senate and House. Its growth has been so rapid as to more than quadruple the collection in the past sixteen years. In 1865 the Library of Congress contained 92,450 volumes; in 1881 it contains 390,000 volumes. Without any extraordinary appropriations or accessions, the Library (which is now the tenth collection numerically in the world) will reach 1,000,000 volumes in less than a quarter of a century. Government libraries never stand still, and the Library of the United States, fed as it is by the entire copyright product of the American press, by the Smithsonian exchanges, by purchases at home and abroad, by presentation of books and documents, and by international exchanges, must speedily become one of the largest, if not the largest, assemblage of books on the globe.

2. The Capitol building is already found altogether too confined in space for the imperative wants of Congress and its committees. Since the enlargement of the legislative body by forty-nine additional Representatives, and the constantly growing expansion of the public business, the numerous committees can no longer be supplied with separate committee-rooms, and the obstructions and inconveniences to the public business from want of space are seriously felt. There is no room whatever within the Library where Senators and Representatives can command a quiet place for writing or for consultation of authorities. Were the bulk of the Library and the immense copyright material removed, space would be found where the members of Congress could pursue their investigations undisturbed. Moreover, several committee-rooms could be created from the store-rooms and passages now occupied by the Library, while its two fire-proof wings might properly be devoted to the storage of books and documents now in insecure quarters, and to the preservation and careful arrangement of the valuable manuscript archives of both Houses of Congress.

3. There is already great insecurity in many parts of the Capitol building, and a constant risk of fire, which might destroy thousands of valuable books and documents. The upper regions of the Library, where its bound newspapers and its maps are stored, are exposed to this danger, and the insecurity increases with every addition that is made to the constantly growing heaps of material, whether books, periodicals, musical compositions, engravings, or maps and charts.

4. The fact that this Library alone of all government libraries is the repository of all the records of copyright, as well as of two copies of every publication thus protected, makes the necessity for a separate building for its accommodation imperative. It is by no means in the number of printed volumes alone that the accessions derived through the copyright law add to the requirement of space. There are annually received thousands of maps, charts, engravings, photographs, chromos, and other objects of art, many of which are of great size, requiring far more space than volumes of books for their proper preservation. The collection of maps and charts alone, if properly arranged for examination, would fill a large hall, and the specimens of graphic art now piled away unarranged except by their copyright stamps and numbers, would fill more than half the space of the existing Library if properly displayed or arranged for examination. The fact that all these copyright accessions, many of them of great pecuniary value, come steadily in day by day to enrich the collection without a dollar of expense to the Government, and are to be preserved in its archives as evidence of copyright under the laws of Congress, imposes upon that body an obligation carefully to provide for their safety and preservation.

5. The copyright department of the Library must speedily have a space not only for the safe keeping of the accessions it brings, but for the constantly growing records and the performance of the clerical labor involved. The entries of copyrights in the office of the Librarian of Congress have increased from 12,688 in 1871 to over 20,500 in 1880, the latter being largely in excess of the average number of patents issued annually, and requiring the receipt and care of two copies of each publication. Want of space for conducting the business of bureaus is complained of in several Departments, but the fact is apparent that the Librarian of Congress has imposed upon him a greater variety and multiplicity of business, with less space for its performance, than has ever been known in any executive office of the Government.

6. No government library known to the committee except our own is now located in the same building devoted to legislative purposes. It has been found indispensable in each European capital to have separate library edifices for the great collections of books gathered at the public cost and through the operations of the copy-tax. Yet in none of these cases is the library charged, as in the United States, with the custody and keeping of all copyright records of the nation. The buildings belonging to the British Museum Library cover eight acres of ground, and it is expected that the collections of art and antiquities there gathered will ultimately have to remove to a separate building to give space to the growing encroachments of the books. The national library of France covers nearly four acres. The present Capitol covers only three and a half acres, and no additions to it of sufficient magnitude to provide for library growth could be made without greatly marring the beauty and effect of that classic edifice.

7. On grounds of public economy also, a separate edifice is demanded for the Library. The estimates of the Architects of the Capitol, Messrs. Walter and Clark, for an extension of the eastern center of the Capitol three hundred and fifty feet place the cost of such an extension at $4,500,000, while the estimates for a separate building vary from $1,500,000 to $4,000,000, according to the magnitude of the edifice and the style of architecture employed. The reason of this difference is found in the fact that any Capitol extension must be carried out in the same costly style of architecture, as to marble columns and capitals, as the existing wings, while no such expensive condition applies to an independent building erected elsewhere. Besides this, it is demonstrated by the measurements of the Architects and the reports of the Librarian that even this large addition to the Capitol would be completely filled with books in about forty years. It would then be necessary at last to erect a separate building, thus burdening the tax-payers with the cost of two library constructions instead of one.

The joint select committee therefore concur unanimously in the absolute necessity of a separate building for the Library. On the important question of its site, this is a matter which was not referred to the commission of architects, but the committee were required to report to Congress "what location would be most suitable for the Library, and afford the highest advantages for its future growth and permanent accommodation, and also in the case of each site the probable cost of the same and of the building." The members of the committee have given much time and consideration to this matter. Deputations have been heard and communications received setting forth the advantages of many squares lying north and south of the Capitol, of a site on Pennsylvania avenue at the foot of the Capitol grounds, of the mall lying between the Smithsonian Institution and the Botanic Garden, and of the squares situated immediately east of the Capitol grounds, and nearly on a level therewith. Most of the first-mentioned locations were objectionable to the committee as not furnishing sufficient level space for an eligible site of a new building of such magnitude as the case requires. The committee do not recommend the repetition of mistakes already made in locating public buildings upon sloping and uneven sites, nor do they think it wise to erect a building of such magnitude either north or south of the Capitol. The great costliness of any site on Pennsylvania avenue is too apparent to require more than mention. The public grounds near the Botanic Garden afford no safe foundation for a large public building, and are objectionable on many other grounds.

The site most eligible of all those involving the purchase of ground is undoubtedly that embraced in the squares lying east of the Capitol Park, and extending from First to Second streets east in one direction, and from North B street to South B street in the other. The taxed valuation of these squares and improvements was about $650,000 three years ago, as reported by the Secretary of the Interior, and a considerable number of improvements have since been added to them. Representatives of the property-holders gave the committee the sum of $1,000,000 as the probable maximum cost of obtaining titles to these squares. While their elevation and vicinity to the Capitol are greatly in favor of their selection as against the other sites before named, the committee cannot advise the purchase by the Government of so large and costly a piece of ground so long as there remain such extensive public reservations on which to erect public buildings without any expense at all for the site. Moreover, great and prejudicial delay, running to between one and two years, must occur in securing title by judicial process, since consent of all the property-holders cannot be obtained. On grounds, therefore, of public economy, as well as of the absolute necessity of providing the most immediate relief to the Library, the committee conclude that it is inexpedient for the Government to become a purchaser of this site or of any other for the Library.

The public reservation known as Judiciary Square, and marked on the plots of the city as reservation 35, appears to the committee to combine greater advantages and fewer disadvantages than any other for the proposed Library building. The map shows that Judiciary Square is geographically in the exact center of the city, and can thus be reached from all points with the least travel, while it is much nearer the center of population than any site upon Capitol Hill. A firm natural foundation for a public building of any size exists in the center of that portion of the square bounded by E and G streets on the one side, and Fourth and Fifth streets on the other. Representations were made to the committee that the grades and the foundation were such as would involve the expenditure of several hundred thousand dollars in preparing a site on Judiciary Square. The matter was referred to the Chief of the Engineer Corps of the Army, General H. G. Wright, for examination, and his report, with that of Colonel Casey, Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, is appended. It disposes conclusively of the objection raised.

Moreover, the square named appears to be the only one central in location on which a public building can be erected with the smallest expense for foundation, with the largest space for proper approaches and ultimate extension, and with the highest regard to public convenience and utility. The objection that it would mar or destroy one of the public parks or breathing places of the city disappears when it is considered that Judiciary Square covers nineteen and one-half acres, of which it is proposed to cover three acres only with a building, leaving sixteen and one-half acres permanently open as a public resort. Moreover, the city of Washington has five hundred and forty-one acres left in Government reservations, while the open avenues and streets embrace 2,554 acres, or 3,095 acres in all, out of 6,111 acres covered by the city. More than half of the area of the capital city is thus permanently reserved for breathing spaces, being a much larger proportion of land free from buildings than in any large city on the globe. The objection that a public building cannot be erected on a public square without a violation of good faith and property rights, disappears before the decisive language of the original deeds of dedication or sale to the Government of the United States. These deeds convey in terms as follows:

"We, the subscribers, in consideration of the great benefits we expect to derive from having the Federal city laid off upon our lands, do hereby agree, and bind ourselves, heirs, executors, and administrators, to convey in trust to the President of the United States, or commissioners, or such person or persons as he shall appoint, by good and sufficient deeds in fee-simple, the whole of our respective land which he may think proper to include within the lines of the Federal city, for the purposes and on the conditions following:

"The President shall have the sole power of directing the Federal city to be laid off in what manner he pleases. He may retain any number of squares he may think proper for any public improvements or other public uses, and the lots only which shall be laid off shall be joint property between the trustees on behalf of the public, and equally divided between the public and the individuals as soon as may be after the city is laid off.

"For the streets the proprietors shall receive no compensation, but for the squares or lands in any form which shall be taken for public buildings, or any kind of public improvements or uses, the proprietors whose lands shall be so taken shall receive at the rate of £25 per acre, to be paid by the public."

In confirmation of this absolute dedication to public uses, whether for parks or for buildings, of the squares and public reservations, we find of record the original instrument, signed by George Washington, President of the United States, and setting apart what was then called "The Judiciary Square," by its present metes and bounds.

Moreover, in an autograph letter from Washington to the commissioners of this city, dated Philadelphia, 20th February, 1797, he disposed decisively of any claim on the part of the original proprietors or their successors to any control of the public reservations. He says:

"If the proprietors, who, in consideration of having the permanent seat of the Government established among them, yielded a portion of their property for public uses, shall afterward take upon themselves to decide what shall not be done with it, they may, by the same parity of reason, direct the uses to which the squares shall be applied. This is too absurd.

"I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,

"GO. WASHINGTON.

"COMMISSIONERS of the City of Washington."

The objection of the remoteness of Judiciary Square from the Capitol has been carefully considered by the committee. They find that with the reservation in the present Library of a selection of from fifty to sixty thousand volumes, filling the whole central hall of the Library, Congress would still have under its own roof all or nearly all the references likely to be wanted during its sessions. Books and authorities not accessible could be dispatched and received at the Capitol from Judiciary Square, by aid of the telephone and a light wagon, in from six to seven minutes of time. The Library is so rich in duplicates that the reservation in the Capitol of this number of volumes could be effected without materially weakening the main collection. Judiciary Square is not only central to the population, but quite as convenient to members of Congress and their families resident in Washington as the Capitol building. And if it be true that the Government owes anything to the people in the direction of the diffusion of intelligence, it cannot admit of a doubt that this great repository of learning, created primarily for the use of the legislative and judicial branches of the Government, should be more freely opened to a far wider circle of readers.

The committee have agreed upon and report the accompanying bill, authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS,
UNITED STATES ARMY.
Washington, D. C., December 20, 1880.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 17th instant, requesting to be informed whether a proper and safe foundation for a Library building of four hundred and fifty by three hundred feet can be secured on Judiciary Square in this city, I beg to invite attention to the following copy of the report on the subject from Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Lincoln Casey, Corps of Engineers, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, to whom it was referred, which will afford the desired information:

"An examination of the position of Judiciary Square, between E and G, and Fourth and Fifth streets, proposed as a site for a Congressional Library building, 300 feet by 450 feet, does not disclose any feature that would necessarily demand an extraordinary expenditure in order to secure a proper and safe foundation for the building contemplated.

"Should the levels of the water table and footings of the foundations be so taken as to require the six-foot sewer passing across the site to be removed, and to be reconstructed along G and Fourth streets, this work could be done for the sum of $20,000.

"It is believed the building can be so located that the earth excavated from the cellar will be sufficient for the slopes around the building, without resorting to changes of grades in the surrounding streets."

I fully concur in the views presented by Colonel Casey in his report.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. G. WRIGHT,
Chief of Engineers, Brigadier and Brevet Major-General.

Hon. D. W. VOORHEES, United States Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. I now ask that the views of the minority of the committee, as presented by the Senator from Vermont, may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The views of the minority will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Not concurring with the majority of the committee as to the selection of Judiciary Square for the site of the Library, I respectfully present, in a brief and hurried manner, some of the reasons for my dissent:

First. It seems to me, with proper deference to those who may think otherwise, that we should preserve the whole of the Library where it will continue primarily to be most convenient and of greatest service to the Senate and House of Representatives, for whom it was originally established. Its chief utility would not be preserved by its removal to so great a distance as has been proposed. It is a new building that is wanted, and not a new library, new name, or new character.

Second. In making a large appropriation for the erection of a library building, one of the foremost, if not paramount, objects should be to obtain absolutely the best and most appropriate site. No one pretends any such merits as to Judiciary Square, however valuable it might be as an open reservation when properly planted and adorned, but its chief, if not only, recommendation appears to be that it is not the worst possible site, and will be cheaper than anything better.

Third. Bad as the best portion of Judiciary Square would be for the Library, it is proposed to occupy the worst, or the lowest and most remote part, lying between E street and G street northwest. If any portion of this reservation should be used for the Library, manifestly its main front ought to be on that part now covered by the City Hall court-house, which should not stand in the way and hide a building of much more imposing dimensions and greater architectural character.

Fourth. For the site of the Library, or for any other public building, no public reservation should now be surrendered except for reasons of extreme necessity. Judiciary Square is the only public reservation in that portion of the city, and should if possible be preserved as such.

Fifth. Although engineers, the longest and practically, perhaps, most conversant with Judiciary Square and its former condition, differ widely as to the probable cost of preparing the foundations for the Library, there is no doubt it may somehow be done, but it is true that a nine-feet sewer, running diagonally across it, would have to be removed, but where it is difficult to say. It is true that a small stream of water formerly pased through it, the bed of which has been filled up. It is true that some part of it was once used as the dumping ground of the city for all sorts of refuse substances; and it is true that Judiciary Square is very far from being level; the corner of E street and Fourth street being 15.94 feet lower than the corner of E street and Fifth street; the corner of G street and Fourth being 6.43 feet above that of the corner of G street and Fifth street; the corner of G street and Fifth street being 11.92 feet lower than the corner of E street and Fifth street; and the corner of G street and Fourth is 10.45 feet above that of E street and Fourth street. Though the building for the Library would cover a smaller area, yet the differences of elevation would still be conspicuous, and could never be completely remedied, and not even partially remedied without considerable expense. At last the site would be forever a poor one, for which no excuse could be given except absolute inability to pay for a better one, and that our posterity will never accept.

Sixth. A far better sight can be had, more accessible, and for a reasonable price, near to and directly east of the present Capitol grounds; and its immense superiority in all respects, save cost, is not controverted, so far as I know, by any member of the committee. Taking the six squares between First and Second streets east, it would be equal to a parallelogram 1,178 feet long and 685 feet wide, and including avenues, streets, and alleys, contains 1,040,378 square feet, more than one-half of which (585,248 feet) would cost nothing, and only 455,130 square feet would have to be paid for. The buildings upon the ground could be sold for a sum largely in excess of the expense of preparing the foundations for the Library; and whatever sold for, would, by that amount diminish the cost of the squares purchased.

Seventh. In order to obtain the best site for Government buildings elsewhere we never fail to make liberal appropriations. For the court-house and post-office in Philadelphia we paid $1,491,200.99. For the custom-house and other offices in Chicago we paid $1,259,385.65. We paid large sums in Cincinnati and Saint Louis. For the post-office and sub-treasury in Boston we paid $1,329,095.84. The cost of these sites seems high; but land in these densely populated and prosperous cities could not be had for less. Can we not afford to deal out equal justice to the capital of the nation where the price of land is far cheaper, as we have done to the commercial capitals of Ohio, Illinois, and Massachusetts? Much, much less is asked for here; and it seems to me sheer parsimony to withhold it. Our constituents do not want us to do what is less than just. They do not want us to be niggardly in matters which deeply concern the capital of the nation.

Eighth. It appears to me that the acquirement of these squares on the east would add much to the appearance of the Capitol grounds. It would give them greater breadth, add beauty to the surroundings of the Capitol, and give symmetry to its connections with streets and avenues. While doing a necessary and proper work, we shall, without any additional expense, effect a substantial improvement of our present possessions.

Ninth. If it is really necessary for us to sell off some part of the real estate belonging to the Government in order to enable it to build a much-needed library, then the question arises whether Judiciary Square should not be cut up in building lots and disposed of at auction. Unquestionably by this course we might reimburse the Treasury for the full amount of the probable cost of the squares east of the Capitol, which appear to me far the most desirable for the site of the great library we are about to build. But I trust to be pardoned for expressing the opinion that our circumstances do not require any such extreme measure.

Tenth. It should be noticed that in the selection of a plan for the Library building, the difference in the estimate of the cost of the one selected and any others, would cover the entire cost of the site east of the Capitol. The question of economy has, therefore, had due consideration, and need not be further pushed.

JUSTIN S. MORRILL.

Mr. VOORHEES. Under the act of Congress of June last the joint select committee on this subject was authorized to select three experts in architecture to consider this question. They did so, and of that board of architects Mr. Edward Clark, the Architect of the Capitol, was made chairman, and as such chairman he laid before the joint select committee last September a report of the views of these architects upon the matter under consideration. I ask the Secretary to read that report, commencing on page 1, where I have marked, and reading to where Mr. Clark signs his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read as follows:

DRAFTS OF REPORTS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 25, 1880.

SIR: The undersigned, a commission appointed by your honorable committee, in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress, approved June 8, 1880, entitled "An act to provide additional accommodations for the Library of Congress," beg leave to report that they have, in conformity with your letter of appointment of June 17, 1880, examined and duly considered the question of what "practical and beneficial changes" can be made in the Capitol with the view of providing better accommodations for the Library, &c. They have unanimously agreed to the following resolution, and respectfully submit the same as their preliminary report:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this commission it is inexpedient if not impracticable to extend the Capitol building so as to provide additional space for the rapid growth of the Library without seriously interfering with the architectural proportions thereof, and also its conveniences for legislative purposes, but that "practical and beneficial" changes, such as mentioned in the act creating this board, can and should be made at no distant day in and of the Capitol for the better accommodation of the two Houses of Congress. We therefore recommend the erection of a separate edifice for the Library.

Very respectfully submitted.

EDWARD CLARK.
ALEX. R. ESTY.
J. L. SMITHMEYER.

To Hon. D. W. VOORHEES,
Chairman of the Joint Select Committee on additional accommodations for the Library of Congress:

SIR: The undersigned, a commission appointed by your honorable committee, in conformity with the act, approved June 8, 1880, entitled "An act to procure additional accommodations for the Library of Congress," beg leave to report that they have met and carefully examined and considered the question of what practicable and beneficial changes can be made to the Capitol, particularly with the view of getting greater space and better accommodations for the Library.

They have arrived at the conclusion that it would not be "practicable and beneficial" to so extend the Capitol as to provide accommodations for the rapid growth of the Library even for a short time, and have, therefore, to recommend that a building detached from it should be erected for the exclusive use of the Library.

The reasons which led to this conclusion are:

First. That to extend the Capitol so as to provide for the growing wants of the Library, even for a few years to come, would not only mar its architectural appearance, but render it more inconvenint for legislative purposes.

Secondly. The inadequacy of the Capitol to contain the vast collection of books and other matter deposited in the Library under the present copyright law, if the collection should increase in the future as it has in the past.

In order to obtain a knowledge of the great space required for the increase of the Library, it should be borne in mind that by its records it is shown that the number of books in it has quadrupled in the last sixteen years, their number now being about three hundred and seventy-five thousand.

Should this rate of increase continue for the next sixteen years—and it is not improbable that such will be the case—the collection will amount to 1,500,000 volumes, requiring, to afford them shelf-room, all the space contained within both halls of legislation, the Old Hall of Representatives, and the Rotunda.

If the same rate of accession should continue for another sixteen years, that is, thirty-two years from the present time, the entire available space of the Capitol would be required for the use of the Library.

It is true that during the past sixteen years there have been some extraordinary accessions, such as the "Force collection," and the transfer to the Library of the exchanges of the Smithsonian Institution, yet it is not improbable that such additions may continue to be made either by purchase or donation.

Amazing as the foregoing statements are relating to the probable growth of the Library, they are made only after careful calculations and measurement.

Your commission are aware that it is necessary to have within the Capitol an adequate parliamentary library; this could be kept in the main room of the present Library should the collection be moved elsewhere. The wings of this Library may be used advantageously for the documentary library of either House; many thousand books belonging to these, particularly that of the House of Representatives, are now deposited in out-of-the-way and insecure portions of the Capitol.

It is the intention of each member of this commission to furnish plans or sketches for a new Library building by the next meeting of Congress.

CAPITOL.

Your commission are of the opinion that many, if not all, the improvements required can be made to the Capitol by extending the eastern front of the center building, so planned that a connecting corridor may run from wing to wing.

This arrangement will offer at times a more convenient means of access between the halls of legislation, and will at all times afford the means of better communication between the wings on the gallery story.

It will also provide additional rooms for committees, and for records and files.

This improvement will have the further advantage of completing the east front in a manner as to give the dome a more proper position when viewed from an easterly direction, and will screen the present sandstone portion of that front with a structure of the same material as the wings.

The halls of legislation may be brought to the windows of the outer walls by taking out some of the interior walls, thus obtaining more light and exposure to the open air.

Very respectfully,

EDWARD CLARK,
Architect United States Capitol.

Hon. D. W. VOORHEES,
Chairman Joint Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress:

Mr. VOORHEES. I yield the floor now to the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who desires to present his views at some length.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the bill by striking out, in lines 4 and 5, the words "on reservation numbered 35, of the public grounds known as Judiciary Square" and inserting in lieu thereof "squares numbered 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, and 731 east of the Capitol, and between B street north and B street south, and First street east and Second street east;" so as to read:

That a fire-proof building for the accommodation of the Library of Congress shall be erected on squares numbered 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, and 731 east of the Capitol, and between B street north and B street south, and First street east and Second street east, &c.

After this amendment has been voted upon, should it be adopted I shall be ready with an amendment providing for the acquirement of the land as proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] on which he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, undoubtedly the subject of the proper site for the Congressional Library has heretofore postponed its construction, and may now bring out differences of opinion on questions of convenience and economy, according to the knowledge or bias of the party who makes known his opinions. But any delay that has occurred, if only the best site shall be at last secured, will not be regretted. All must now be ready to admit the propriety of an early conclusion of the whole matter. A new building is an inexorable necessity. No one can more deeply regret than I do my inability to entirely agree with my respected associates of the joint select committee as to the most suitable site for the Library. For my own opinion I neither seek nor expect the slightest consideration; but for the facts in the case, and any legitimate arguments based thereon, I hope reasonable, even critical and laborious, attention will be granted. Personally, it is not likely to be to me of any earthly account, as the Library, placed wherever it may be, will require not less than three years for its completion; and, at my time of life, not much opportunity will then remain for me here to make its treasures available.

If the opinions formerly advanced by me in favor of the site east of the Capitol are still adhered to it is not in the spirit of dogmatism, not in the stiffness which upholds pride of opinion, but because the Capitol and Capitol Hill are still here and will remain here forever. There is no power in the longest argument to lift an inferior site above it. Valuing the money in the Treasury which comes from the pockets of the people as dearly as any other Senator, it is my sincere conviction that this site, near at hand, elevated, dry, and healthy, with all the adhering advantages of its surroundings, very far transcends in value even any exaggerated estimate of its utmost cost, although in point of fact it would turn out in the end, as I believe, upon the full completion of the Library, to be the cheapest in dollars and cents—leaving Judiciary Square still in our possession and of great value as a minor park.

If any share of the character of the Library of Congress is to be preserved its proximity to the Capitol must be an important consideration, where members of both Houses can make it equally available, and where others, who come here from all parts of our country, would find it with the smallest expenditure of time or money. Such visitors will want to look at both the Capitol and the Library, and, in accord with the old adage, "kill two birds with one stone." Scholars, students of history, and scientists—all who come here to consult the Library—will be better accommodated and better suited to find it near the Capitol.

Waiving the question of cost, I think all the members of the committee were and are agreed that the site east of the Capitol was and is much to be preferred. Its elevation and vicinity are greatly in its favor, they say, but that it is large and costly. The difference in the cost, if there should be any, after the foundations have been made ready to receive the superstructure, would be found, I am convinced, wholly insignificant—not so much as the mere difference of cost between the plan of the building selected, which was the lowest and cheapest, and that of any other presented and considered; and yet this little difference, not deemed worthy of consideration in the cost of the building itself, and which we should not think of higgling about in a site for a public building at Chicago, where we paid out $1,259,385.65, or at Boston, where we paid $1,329,095.84, is offered as an insuperable obstacle in the way of a proper site. We have paid without wincing such sums for eligible sites for buildings as $708,036 in Cincinnati and $1,491,000.99 in Philadelphia; but when the General Government needs a site at its own capital for a building that should specially test the good sense and liberality of an American Congress, it is to have no choice, it seems, except what may turn up on some vacant and neglected lot. Nothing is too good for State capitals, but the national capital, shame to say, must be relegated to Coventry and put up with anything if even wrongly labeled as cheap.

The unfortunate positions, and the lame, incongruous, and pitiful surroundings of the Interior and Post-Office Departments, destitute of all margins, trenching upon narrow streets, and smothered among cheap restaurants, it was to have been hoped would prevent any repetition of awkward and incurable mistakes in the selection of sites for public buildings at the national capital. We have no castles, nor cathedrals; and we do not cover our "domes with gold nor our walls with ivory;" but we may insist in this "city of magnificent distances" upon the selection of not merely possible but upon the best possible sites. Whatever more the growth of our country may demand in this direction, we ought at least to insist that henceforth our light shall not be hid "under a bushel."

The site directly east of the Capitol is, beyond all cavil, one of transcendent merits. It is conspicuous, and, it may not be extravagant to say, if selected, will be thoroughly good. Beyond all this, being but one full square distant from the Capitol it will be more accessible and far more convenient than any more distant location can be.

Unless Congress is to be divorced utterly from the Library of Congress, the members of the House and Senate will never consent to be cut aloof from it by any considerable distance. It should, as it appears to me, be under the immediate and daily supervision of Congress, from which it has hitherto drawn all of its sustenance and support, and to which it lends all its stores of useful knowledge. The Joint Committee on the Library, familiar with its wealth and its deficiencies, should make themselves constantly heard and felt in its guidance and administration, and mark each year by some worthy advance and some creditable improvement.

When the city of Washington was laid out, President Washington, and Jefferson, then Secretary of State, took a leading and very painstaking interest in the matter. A French officer of great merit, Major L'Enfant, was employed for this important work. The excellence of the elaborate plan proposed and adopted, as soon as the skeleton streets and avenues became partially decorated with buildings, was fully justified and acknowledged. To aid the officer in charge, Mr. Jefferson furnished the plans of twelve important cities of Europe, together with his own notes, and wrote to him as follows:

Considering that the grounds to be reserved for the public are to be paid for by the acre, I think very liberal reservations should be made for them; and, if this be about the Tiber and on the back of the town, it will be of no injury to the commerce of the place, which will undoubtedly establish itself on the deep waters toward the eastern branch and mouth of Rock Creek, the water about the mouth of the Tiber not being of any depth.

Jefferson, it appears, would be liberal, not niggardly, about public reservations, especially as they were then only to be paid for by the acre. On such matters no better informed man was then in the Cabinet of Washington. There was some foresight, too, in the direction as to where these reservations should be established. That about the Tiber, if we can only abate the railroad nuisances, as many think they should be abated at once and "without benefit of clergy," will soon form one of the most attractive small parks of the country, and with very little cost. Extending from the shore of the Potomac, through the very heart of the city, to and around the Capitol, this park is destined to grow in completed beauty, and to become a common and favorite resort for recreation and life-preserving exercise in the open air. Within the last twenty-five years over forty million dollars has been expended in the United States by twenty cities for public parks. They are things the people are not forbidden to covet.

The Judiciary Square reservation is on what Mr. Jefferson undoubtedly referred to as the back of the town, and it is the only reservation anywhere in all that part of the city. To build upon it at all would be perhaps a breach of good faith toward all the land-holders in that part of the national capital, and certainly a flagrant breach of good taste, as well as a violation of one of the foremost sanitary principles relating to the health of large cities.

It seems to be assumed that the Government of the United States has unlimited power to do whatever it chooses with the public grounds in the city of Washington, regardless of the rights of those whose lots may abut on the same, and that such parties can have no claim, legal or equitable, for any damages suffered which Congress is bound to respect. Such is not the opinion of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, as appears by their report, No. 795, submitted January 25, 1881, upon the "bill to confirm to the city of Chicago the title to certain public grounds;" and they set forth the rule of public law to be as follows:

The lots having been sold as delineated upon the recorded plat, the purchasers acquired an interest in the streets and public grounds on which their lots abutted; and it is manifest that the Government could not after the sale make any disposition of those streets or public grounds inconsistent with the use to which they had been dedicated. The attempt to do so, if it had the power, without the consent of the lot-owners interested, or making adequate provision for their compensation, would be a flagrant act of bad faith.

The lots abutting upon Judiciary Square were beyond all doubt sold by the Government as delineated on the recorded plat, with Judiciary Square as a public reservation; and, if so sold, how can we now, according to the opinion of the Senate Judiciary Committee, dedicate it to other uses without the consent of the lot-owners interested, or without making adequate compensation? Congress can vote as it may please; it has the power, and the lot-owners will have no remedy. But will that make it any less "a flagrant act of bad faith?"

This reservation, save what is, and probably must be, occupied by the City Hall court-house, should be preserved forever as a healthful breathing-place, ever green, and decorated with trees and shrubs, offering shade and rest to the weary, and a joyous play-ground for the gambols of childhood. If Judiciary Square had been properly planted, as was Franklin Square only a few years since, it would now be regarded as little less than vandalism to cover and bury it beneath even a three-story pile of brick and stone. To occupy and retrench or obliterate the reserved squares, circles, and triangles, where the birds and the common people most do congregate, would be destructive of the best appreciated characteristics of the national capital, which we are as much bound to look after and preserve as the Library itself. If we cannot improve our capital, we may at least try not to strip it of its chief jewels. The city of New York has twelve parks, and London has to-day more land in parks, so it is said, than all of the cities in America put together. In comparison we have here but a thimbleful of scraps and patches.

To create vacant spaces for small parks, such as the one in the "geographical center of the city," which it is now proposed to profane and destroy, many other cities are now with lavish expenditures buying lots and squares covered with buildings, and that is the sorry predicament to which the city of Washington may hereafter be exposed if we jump on to the very few unoccupied public reservations of any extent which now remain whenever the growth of the country requires an additional edifice. To seize upon Judiciary Square, standing solitary and alone in its neighborhood as it does, would seem not only wrong but an inexcusable blunder. Whatever we now need can be had for a moderate price—less than at any time hereafter. If the Government is able to build at all, it is surely able to pay for a decent site. We are no longer making plans for three million of crippled colonists, but for fifty million of prosperous republican citizens, destined in thirty years to increase and multiply to one hundred million.

If straitened circumstances forced us to sell Judiciary Square and with the proceeds to buy a site for the Library, undoubtedly it would fetch enough to more than pay for the site east of the Capitol; but I venture to think we are neither forced to put the Library upon it, nor to cut it up and sell it at auction for ordinary building lots. Even should it ultimately be doomed to public use as a building lot, it is an open question whether or not some other department of the Government, the Interior Department or the General Post-Office, may not be more appropriately entitled to consideration.

Both the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Interior have in their last reports earnestly called the attention of Congress to their present lamentably inadequate accommodations. Large portions of their forces are already turned out of doors. If a new General Post-Office should be built the present building might answer well the purpose of a city post-office for Washington, though more modest in its dimensions and cost than those which have been planned for some of the chief cities in several States. The difficulty, possibly, might be solved by an extension of the Post-Office westward equal to the dimensions of the present building. But more room somewhere is already loudly called for.

The Department of the Interior is in a much worse condition, having four out of eight of its different branches of service removed far away in buildings temporarily rented. Six hundred and sixteen clerks, not including the Census Office, or 1,823 if that office should be included, are employed or were recently employed outside of the Interior Department. The Patent Office has grown so rapidly in size and importance as to need, or soon will need, the entire building, which was originally designed largely for its special accommodation. All the records of the Land Office, of priceless value, are now liable to sudden destruction by fire through the first and lightest accident.

The Secretary of the Interior, with great boldness and eminent good taste, suggests that all the squares around La Fayette Square should be purchased and covered with buildings for such of the Executive Departments as are not now amply provided for.

That this would be both grand and convenient, surpassing any arrangement of government buildings elsewhere, will hardly be disputed, but it would call for a considerable outlay; and yet it may be that the generation which is treading on our heels may not regard it as too extravagant for them to act upon. If at the outset the growth of our country could have been prophetically anticipated, and such a plan had been then projected, all would now recognize its peculiar fitness. Indeed, the buildings of the Executive Departments as originally placed were all symmetrically clustered around the Executive Mansion; but we have outgrown both those petit buildings and the modest space then allotted to our infancy. The log-hut and the clearing always give place to the family mansion and the farm. Hercules is no longer in his cradle.

A site for the Library fronting the Executive Mansion, and on the opposite side of La Fayette Square, would on many accounts, perhaps, favorably compete with that of Judiciary Square. In the first place the site itself, with its surroundings, would be a fine one; and, as all members of Congress have more or less business at the Departments, they would be able to visit both them and the Library together without any great loss of time. It would not be an out-of-the-way place. The sedentary corps who go to spend the day in the Library would find it more accessible, and it would also afford more practical use to the officials and inmates of the Executive Departments. The building would stand where it could be seen; and if a creditable specimen of architecture, as it should be, this consideration should not be wholly disregarded. But in none of these considerations can there be much competition with the site east of the Capitol, which stands immeasurably superior to all others. Its contiguity to the Capitol, its elevation, and the cheapness and speediness with which it can be made ready to receive its basement foundations, are all unanswerable arguments in its favor.

That there is to be serious difficulty and expense in obtaining a solid foundation for a library on Judiciary Square has been ascertained since the report of the joint select committee through actual examinations and measurements by competent engineers and architects. The statement of the committee on page 6 of their report, it appears, cannot be fully sustained by the facts in the case. They say that—

A firm natural foundation for a building of any size exists in the center of that portion of the square bounded by E and G streets on the one side and by Fourth and Fifth streets on the other.

If so, the "natural foundation" is as deep as a well and wider than a barn door. The amount of misinformation conveyed in all this is considerable, and was based upon statements honestly believed, but not warranted by any practical or personal knowledge on the part of those who made them.

The old gulch or ravine, one hundred and fifty feet wide, through which formerly flowed a branch of the Tiber, "once called Goose Creek," and where in 1856 while being filled with the rubbish from the foundation of the post-office, a journeyman carpenter fell in and was drowned, has been filled to the extent of fifteen to twenty feet. No architect would risk a building on that foundation, and to obtain a safe foundation it will be necessary to excavate until hard-pan shall be reached at the bottom. The eight-foot sewer crosses the square obliquely from the northwest corner to E street on the southeast, and a smaller branch sewer connects with the larger at a point very near to the center of the proposed library building, and just where the committee strangly say there is "a firm natural foundation." The manhole found here has enabled a measurement to be taken which shows the bottom of the sewer to be over eighteen feet below the surface. Incontestably, therefore, very much of the excavations and foundation walls must be made to a depth of nearly twenty feet, and the cost of the foundation and basement walls to the surface of the ground, together with the cost of changing the sewers through different streets, cannot be estimated at less than a very large sum of money. No engineer, unless a partisan, and no architect worthy of his title, will venture to dispute this fact, and, if it cannot be disputed, it goes far to settle the whole question of economy against Judiciary Square, as a half million of dollars will pay for all the ground strictly required for a library on the site east of the Capitol. What more ground is to be acquired is wanted for other and equally important and beneficial purposes.

But this is not all. Whether the base of the Library on Judiciary Square should be placed on a level with the base of the City Hall, or on a level with the present surface of the ground, the approaches to the Library would require an extensive system of terraces or staircases upon three sides; or if these were to be avoided, then the whole site would require to be filled and graded to some general and equal elevation, which would drag after it the necessity for a change of nearly all the grades of the surrounding streets. It would not be easy to select any point, unless it should be Kidwell's Bottoms, suggestive of greater or more expensive difficulties, and they are not imaginary difficulties, but real and absolute.

The squares on the right and left of the Capitol, north or south, need of course to be built upon to shut out inharmonious vacancies, and doubtless will be built upon as soon as offered upon reasonable terms, but a library would cover but a small part of the boundary of the grounds north or south of the Capitol, and that rather grotesquely on one side only, which would give to one House of Congress better accommodations than to the other. A building here on either side must be of the kangaroo sort, with hind legs much the longest, and when completed would be a worthy gift to anybody who would forthwith remove it. The bad taste of Judiciary Square is at least out of sight, but this would be constantly thrust in our faces.

The lots east of the Capitol which it is proposed to take extend from B street north to B street south, 1,518 feet, and from First street east to Second street east, 507 feet, or including First street 617 feet. It will be seen, therefore, that the land to be acquired is more than double what will be actually needed or covered by the proposed library. One-half of it, including First street east, would be 759 feet long by 617 feet wide, of which the Library would occupy not more than 450 feet by 300 feet, which might be at the south or north side, leaving room upon the other side for a building perhaps to accommodate the Supreme Court, whose quarters in the Capitol are notoriously inconvenient and circumscribed, and all the rooms now occupied by the court are greatly needed for the use of Congress.

Or if it should be preferred, as I do not think it would be, the Library could be placed in the center, leaving all the remainder as open spaces not to be occupied by any other building. In any event the addition of these squares would be a felicitous and greatly needed addition to the grounds, and with the Library would be a proper finish and complement to the surroundings east of the Capitol. It does not require the eye of an expert to see this, although every expert would at once concede its propriety and even its indispensability.

I have not on this subject given to the interests of the people east of the Capitol the slightest weight, but have felt that the interest of Congress, of the capital, and of the whole people of the United States should have paramount if not exclusive sway. It was, nevertheless, expected when the capital was first laid out, that the high lands east of the Capitol would be earliest occupied, and that the deep waters of the Eastern Branch would attract considerable commerce. These expectations have been delayed, but not altogether and forever thwarted. Another prosperous decade for the city like the last will exhaust the chief part of the most desirable lots in the western part of the city, and before that time elapses the great and substantial merits of the eastern portion of the city will be sure to be more appreciated. The political capital of our country may not ever furnish a great field for trade or commerce, it is not to be wished that it should, but the salubrity of its climate, and its increasing advantages in science, arts, and letters, and of its cosmopolitan society, are sure to induce many persons of means and culture to come here and found temporary or permanent homes. Vacant lots will be wanted.

A very large proportion of the owners of the land on the site east of the Capitol, I am glad to be able to say, have already signed a written contract, naming the sum, if their lots should be wanted, which they bind themselves to accept for their property. This at least is a great and substantial gain. The terms will be found in the main reasonable; though some have included damages for the change years ago of the grades of streets which may be disputed; and where the terms may be found unreasonable, or where terms have been unobtainable, the usual course of condemnation can be resorted to, and it is unlikely that sworn appraisers will put a higher value upon any parcels of land than that proposed to be willingly accepted by their neighbors for adjoining lots. The Government is sure of honest, nay, prompt and liberal treatment, and no advantage is open to any selfish schemes, if, as I do not believe, there are any such.

There being some portion of the lots or estates that cannot well be obtained by purchase, it will be necessary to authorize their condemnation and appraisal for public use, by the courts, but this will take much less time than that which would be required for the extra labor on the foundations of Judiciary Square. The time required, if the court should be in session—and a session can be provided for in any event—would be very brief, and not at most exceeding a few weeks. The rights of the present owners must of course be protected by giving them reasonable notice; but within ten or fifteen days after the appointment of appraisers, and after the appraisal, the money can be deposited with the court and possession of the property obtained.

If the Library shall be removed to any distance from the Capitol, the annual expense of its administration must be largely increased, and it will become either a town library, mainly utilized in circulating the latest sensational novels, or it will become a national rival to the large libraries of large cities, where costly outlays for costly acquisitions would be demanded by any ambitious librarian of the newborn and much-to-be-petted national library. It would never do to be eclipsed by Cambridge, New York, or Boston; and the new library would soon be looked up to, backed by the longest purse, as the highest bidder for rare old books, which it is a great honor to possess and no reproach not to read.

If the Library should be placed directly east of the Capitol, its annual accretions would continue to be, as in the past, regular and comparatively inexpensive, and our usual mail-carriers, which now often bring from or carry to the Library books for members, might continue this incidental and useful work. But start a library upon the back part of Judiciary Square, or upon any other spot equally remote, and then a stable and carriage-house, an express wagon and landaulet, would at once become useful and esthetic. Thus situated, the Library might accommodate a dozen members who have residences near, or who may temporarily board near the low, uninviting, lop-sided spot, but it would be at the positive discomfort of all others. It would be a town library inflated with the idea that it had "a local habitation and a name" at the national metropolis. With the site fixed east of the Capitol, any member, even during the session of either House of Congress, if he chose so to do, could go to and return from it in less than six minutes; but remove it to Judiciary Square, more than five times farther off, and practically it would be of very little daily use to the great majority of the members of the House and Senate. The character of the Library would no longer be greatly controlled by Congress and the joint committee most noted for its erudition, but would be whatever a succession of accomplised librarians would be able to make it. The proposition to find room for the Library within the walls of the present Capitol, or within some monstrous hybrid addition, has been year after year pronounced untenable by every committee charged with its consideration, and by the original and by the present Architect of the Capitol Extension, as well as by every other architect of any repute, and by all experts who have been consulted. This idea of still huddling the Library into some corner of the Capitol building, or of hideously deforming it by an indefinite expansion of its body or wings, could only obtain a lodgment in the brain of intelligent men from the advantages arising from keeping the Library within reach of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

It is obvious that any addition even to the Capitol for library purposes would afford only temporary relief at the cost of permanent disfigurement, and would necessarily add something to the distance to be overcome, which would be only a very little if any less than that required to reach the Library on the site east of the Capitol, and this is the only site which will place the Library where it will be nearly as accessible to both Houses of Congress as it would be in the Capitol itself. In point of fact it would hardly be more distant from the Capitol than is the Senate wing from that of the House, and it is the nearest site having even any tolerable recommendations. The present park east of the Capitol is five hundred and seven feet broad, and that, with the width of First street east, (110 feet,) would be about the distance to be overcome. Any gentleman with health and vigor enough to discharge his duties in either House of Congress would not find it a very tedious walk to reach the Library.

Judiciary Square is mainly accessible by streets at right angles, and has no large avenue or thoroughfare by which it can be otherwise easily and directly approached. Massachusetts avenue lies far away to the north, and Pennsylvania avenue is out of the way on the south. The so-called Louisiana and Indiana avenues are hardly avenues at all, but merely broad, oblique driveways, leading, like Four-and-a-half street, only to the City Hall court-house. In fact, they are "so brief and so soon done for, that the world wonders what they were begun for." They will not lead to the Library, for that is to be at the farther end of the square. If any incidental proof were needed to show that the erection of great over shadowing public buildings on Judiciary Square was no part of the original design, it would be found in the fact not only that we recently removed the jail from it as a public nuisance, but that the streets on the east and the west sides—or Fourth and Fifth streets—stop short at the south end, and do not run through to Pennsylvania avenue. Thus on two sides, the east and west, there is at the south end to be no direct inlet or outlet. The only pathway will be roundabout and circumlocutory.

On the whole, if the title to Judiciary Square was not owned by the Government, we could not afford, as it seems to me, to accept it as a gift when coupled with the condition that we must build a library upon it at an expense of three million or more dollars. The ground is not only awkwardly out of the way, a place now unvisited for any purpose, but it lacks suitable elevation, and the surface has unmanageable differences of level. To build upon this merely because we have found it in our possession would be equal to the economy displayed by the man who having found a linch-pin in order to save it went to the expense of building a carriage to match it.

If a new library building is a present necessity, as I am profoundly convinced, it is almost farcical to diminish its dignity and usefulness by consigning it to a back lot, on the vain idea that unless we do so we shall lose a linch-pin. A library which is to hold all and the best intellectual products of the nation, with the best selections from those of the whole world, should have, next to the Capitol itself, a worthy, elevated, and healthy site, and the flat at the farther end of Judiciary Square is most assuredly not such a site.

Let me appeal to Senators, in conclusion, to keep the Library as a vine and fig-tree of Congress, with its fruits within reach and control. Let it stand near by, but not so near as to crowd us out, and remain what it has been, of direct practical use to the representatives of the States and of the people, and the storehouse to which those residing here or elsewhere pursuing political, scientific, historical or other studies may find the best portion of all that recorded knowledge which has been preserved by the "art preservative of all arts." Let the Library increase in strength and value by its regular and costless home additions, and by very discreet and limited purchases of important works published abroad, rather than by a sudden change of name, of site, and of character to start out in the great modern strife of accumulating the largest number of portly books. Do not let us spoil a building of exceptional importance, one that should inspire generous treatment, by consigning it to an inconvenient and inappropriate place, where the next Congress and every succeeding Congress would be tempted to remove it. Finally do not let us be seduced by any wholly unfounded claims of economy, but instead let us soberly estimate and meet present and future exigencies and trust the country to comprehend that work well done needs not to be repented of, and that work ill done will be speedily exposed, while it may linger as a perpetual reproach.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, at this late day in the session, and with this night waning away, I am too eager for action upon this great and important question to waste many moments in discussion. If this question is not understood by the fifty or sixty intelligent gentlemen who are Senators in this Chamber present to-night, there is nothing that can be said by the Senator from Vermont or by myself that will bring them to a correct conclusion. In fact, there is not much debatable ground about it. I will indulge, however, in a brief statement in regard to the action and motives of the committee.

When the joint select committee was created there were three localities which pressed themselves upon our consideration, and but three. While we took into consideration other points, they were not commanding enough to engage serious investigation. The three propositions which were prominent in our minds were, first, whether the Library could be accommodated in this building, or in connection therewith. Many people, distinguished men, men of practical judgment, too, were of the opinion that it could be. I presume nobody will doubt that if that could be accomplished with due regard to the architecture, symmetry, and harmony of this building, it would be desirable. For the purpose of advising ourselves upon that point, as well as upon others, we were empowered by the act to call to our assistance three eminent architects of the United States. We exercised our judgment upon that question. We selected three gentlemen of distinguished standing and of high character in their profession.

With entire unanimity that board of architects decided that this Capitol building could not be adapted to the use and accommodation of the Library even now without impairing its structure, much less in the immediate future. As the commission of architects reported to the joint select committee, which report has been read at the Clerk's desk to-night, signed by Edward Clark, the chairman, within the next sixteen years, according to the present rate of accumulation of the Library, this whole building would no more than afford proper accommodations for it.

We are face to face with the question of building an imposing structure to accommodate a national library as has heretofore not been in this world; or else must refuse to receive the intellectual products of the times, burn up some that we have, and reject what is coming. We have got to do one or the other. The architects advise us that in the course of time this building will have to undergo some changes for legislative purposes, and that with those changes there could not be connected such changes as the Library would require without totally destroying the original design of this magnificent structure.

I do not, for one, feel at liberty to fly in the face of professional opinions of that kind. Whatever other gentlemen may do, I feel myself instructed by superior wisdom upon that point. I am not an architect; I know no Senator who is. I know no Senator whose opinion I will take for one moment as against the opinion of any one of these architects, much less against them all combined. So I felt constrained, and so did the joint select committee unanimously, to concur with the board of architects and let the Capitol building alone.

The question, divorced from this building, arose then in connection with other places, and the two localities that in my judgment and in the judgment of the entire committee contended with each other were Judiciary Square and the locality designated by the Senator from Vermont east of the present Capitol building. I say here, that if the Senate is not willing to locate this building on Judiciary Square, I hope, and I will vote, to place it on the locality designated by the Senator from Vermont. I do not consider any other locality as competing for this building in point of eligibility.

I wish to say to the Senate and to the Senator from Vermont what he very well knows, that I have no prejudices against the locality east of us. In fact, once upon an occasion, some two years ago, I indulged in some favorable remarks in my place in the Senate toward that locality; but, rebuked for my want of economy so severely by the Senator from Vermont on the opening day of this session after the 1st of January, as he will remember, I felt that I must economize as far as I could. The situation now seems reversed. The Senator from Vermont can contemplate the expenditure of a million dollars of money as composedly as anybody, and inasmuch as my reputation perhaps as an economist needs building up somewhat, I take the other view. In other words, if ground is to be purchased, I would far rather the Senate of the United States should inaugurate the real estate business than to have done it myself as chairman of the select committee. I can speak for the rest of the committee also, with the exception of the Senator from Vermont.

Judiciary Square we own. It costs us nothing. When the question was presented to us in committee as between Judiciary Square and the eastern front, it was a comparison as between $1,000,000 and nothing. That was the choice to which we were reduced. A million dollars confronted us over here, and nothing down yonder. The Senator from Vermont says now that we can purchase the ground east for half a million dollars.

Mr. MORRILL. No; the Senator misunderstood what I said; and I am so hoarse I do not wonder that he did.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think it safe for the Senator to correct that statement.

Mr. MORRILL. I said that the ground that could be acquired for this purpose would cost about half a million. I admit that it will cost a million to get all the blocks I propose, and I am in favor of acquiring the whole at the cost of a million; but the Library will only occupy one-half of it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think myself that the eagerness of persons to sell real estate here upon the east front of the Capitol has induced them, in view of this report in favor of Judiciary Square, to moderate their pretensions somewhat.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. VOORHEES. And I think it probable that I deserve some thanks from the economists of this body for making a report which has lowered the price of real estate east of the Capitol.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator from Indiana if we are under any obligations to receive the owners' own estimate of the value of the property; if we cannot have it assessed under the law?

Mr. KERNAN. That is the last thing we should undertake to do.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Does the Senator think we cannot find honest assessors?

Mr. KERNAN. I am speaking from past experience. Look at the ground at the foot of the hill here, how it was assessed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am greatly in hope the Senator from Georgia is correct, and that honest assessors can be found when this real estate bargaining begins. As I have said before, I have no prejudices against the location east of the Capitol, and but for the question of economy I would have not the slightest objection to the location of the Library at that spot.

I cannot allow, however, the statements made by the Senator from Vermont in regard to Judiciary Square to go without a word or two of comment. The eagerness, the anxiety, the hungry pursuit which has been made by property owners here on the Hill has not confined itself merely to their own property, but it has spent itself in maligning and traducing the eligibility of Judiciary Square. The idea held forth that an extraordinary expense would be necessary to make a safe foundation in Judiciary Square, I am convinced is utterly and wholly incorrect. On that question I consulted not merely by letter, as I was instructed to do by the select committee, but also in person, General Wright, the Chief of Engineers, and obtained from him a written report transmitting a report of Colonel Casey, the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, they stating that it was a place for an excellent and cheap foundation. As opposed to them come the statements of hired lawyers employed to argue this case before the committee, and whose arguments the Senator from Vermont honestly believes to be true, supplemented by engineers' or surveyors' reports. I say that kind of testimony, that kind of argument is made to confront the Engineer's Office. I will not hesitate to characterize the statement, for instance, of an engineer by the name of Forsythe, that the site of Judiciary Square would require an expenditure of $450,000 to prepare it for a building, as an outrage on common sense, and it is so regarded by the Engineer Corps. I believe that Judiciary Square presents as eligible a site as any other. I believe, and I have reason to believe, for we have investigated the subject carefully, that it presents an excellent foundation. As to its accessibility, a thousand men and women pass and repass Judiciary Square coming and going to and from this Capitol building from the main central portion of the city, where one person would pass and repass the building if it were located east of us. Of course, persons visiting the Capitol could very easily go there, but persons can hardly come to the Capitol at all without passing Judiciary Square. I say this in justification and vindication of the judgment of the committee.

But, Mr. President, I said that I would not detain the Senate, nor will I. My earnest desire is to build a Library building. I believe we are to have the proudest monument of books the world has seen. I have heretofore discussed the history, the completion, and the probable future of the Library. I shall not do so now. Let the Senate determine the question. Wherever in its judgment the Library ought to be built, I shall be content. I have no dogmatism upon this subject. The books which it will contain will be open to us all, wherever it may be located. I will find them and you will find them. It is not a matter of vital consequence whose corner lot is occupied by this great enterprise. I desire and I have given my earnest thought and purpose to redeem the condition of the Library by giving it room, and I may be pardoned for saying that I would rather have my name associated with the successful erection of a Library, which will in the next quarter of a century—perhaps I shall not live to see, but others will—have such a collection of books as will be the greatest honor and ornament to the American name.

I hope we shall vote. We have talked for thirteen years; we have spent money year after year for the last eight years. Whenever this subject comes up it has taken time and passed on and been laid aside. I have struggled, as the Senate will bear witness this winter after our committee labors were done, to get a hearing. I now want a verdict, and I believe that the wisdom of the Senate will agree by a majority upon some place where this building will rise toward the heavens, and that it will stand as a conspicuous honor to the present Congress of the United States. I hope we shall vote to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. THURMAN. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 4 it is proposed to strike out "reservation numbered 35 of the public grounds, known as Judiciary Square," and insert "squares numbered 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, and 731 east of the Capitol, between B street north and B street south, and First street east and Second street east."

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I think it is nearly five years since, in some brief remarks I submitted to the Senate on the subject of a new Library building, I expressed the opinion that we ought not to expend a million dollars in purchasing private property when we had so eligible a piece of ground as Judiciary Square on which the building could be erected. I have seen no reason from that day to this to change that opinion. On the contrary, I am greatly strengthened in it by the almost unanimous report of the joint committee. I believed it then; I believe it now. I give all the consideration that they are entitled to to the opinions of the Senator from Vermont, who takes so deep an interest in this subject; but they are not satisfactory to my mind. So far as the convenience of Congress is concerned, all the books necessary for the working library of Congress could be held in one-fourth of the library space that is now in this Capitol. I venture the assertion in the firm belief of its truth, that of the 400,000 volumes in the Library of Congress not 5,000 are ever touched in any one single year. I do not count the same book, which may be touched half a dozen times, but not 5,000 separate volumes are touched in any one year unless it be by the employés of the Library.

Mr. CONKLING. Including the law library?

Mr. THURMAN. Oh, no, I do not include the law library. Why, Mr. President, the idea to which I refer is the greatest mistake in the world. The most learned men that ever lived had not a library of a thousand volumes; the ablest men that ever lived had not a library of five hundred volumes; the best thinkers, the men whose genius has done more to enlighten the world than all others, had but few books; they read them and understood them and then thought. It is thought, and not a multitude of books, that makes great men; that makes men great in literature, in art, in science, in practical life, and in statesmanship.

Mr. President, when I say this I am not antagonizing the idea of a great library. I am perfectly willing that we should have one. I know very well that the British Museum is an honor to Great Britain; that the French library in Paris is an honor to France. I am perfectly willing that we should have a great library; but although every great library collected as ours is must contain an immense amount of trash that would be better burned than preserved, yet I am willing to vote for a liberal appropriation to build a suitable building for as large a library as may arise in the city of Washington, but I do not want to expend money extravagantly; I do not want unnecessarily, for the mere purpose of taking a more beautiful site than one we own, or because one site is a little more beautiful than another, to expend one million of the people's money at a time when I think that economy is not only a wise policy but the absolute duty of Congress.

But, sir, I did not intend to speak, and I shall not speak any longer. I say that in my judgment Judiciary Square, containing nineteen and a half acres of ground, affords ample room for as large a building as ever will be needed and leave space enough for a park in that part of the city.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. THURMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. VOORHEES, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, was called.) The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] desired me to announce the fact that he is ill this evening, and he is paired with me on this question. If he were here, I should vote "nay" and he would vote "yea" on this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, (when Mr. HAMLIN's name was called.) The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] on this question.

Mr. MCDONALD. Reserving to me the right to vote if it is necessary to make a quorum. If the Senator from Maine were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay," and I shall vote if it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. MORRILL. I will also announce that the Senators from Connecticut are paired with each other. Senator PLATT is paired with Senator EATON.

Mr. MAXEY, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Florida, [Mr. CALL.] If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. BROWN.]

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] is paired on this question with the Senator from Colorado, [Mr. TELLER.]

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] is compelled to be absent this evening. If present, he would vote for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 7; as follows:

Mr. MORRILL. I now offer an amendment to come in at the end of the bill, which I send to the Chair.

The proposed amendment was read, as follows:

SEC. —. That in order to provide a suitable site for a building for the Library of Congress and for other public purposes, the following parcels of land situated east of the Capitol grounds shall be purchased by the Secretary of the Interior or, taken for public use, namely: Squares designated on the plan of the city of Washington as numbers 728 and 729, and triangular parcels designated thereon as numbers 726, 727, 730, and 731; the whole being bounded on the north by B street north, on the east by Second street east, on the south by B street south, and on the west by First street east, and supposed to contain 455,130 superficial feet, exclusive of avennes, streets, and alleys.

SEC. —. That a sum of money sufficient to pay for said land, in the mode hereinafter provided, is hereby appropriated therefor, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Interior shall be authorized to purchase said land, or any part thereof, as soon as practicable, at such prices as may be fixed by agreement between the said Secretary and the respective owners, not exceeding the actual cash value thereof, nor the prices at which the respective owners shall have consented in writing to sell the same to the United States, and payment therefor shall be made to the respective owners on the requisitions of the Secretary of the Interior upon the release and conveyance of said lands to the United States by good and sufficient deeds executed in due form of law and approved by the Attorney-General of the United States.

SEC. —. That if the Secretary of the Interior shall be unable to purchase the whole of said land by agreement with the respective owners within thirty days after the passage of this act, he shall at the expiration of such period of thirty days make application to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, at a general or special term, by petition containing a particular description of the property required, with the name of the owner or owners thereof, and his, her, or their residence, as far as the same can be ascertained, which court is hereby authorized and required, upon such application, without delay, to appoint five commissioners, freeholders of the District of Columbia, who shall, after such notice to all persons interested as the said court shall prescribe, make under oath a just and equitable appraisement of the cash value of the several interests of each and every owner of the real estate and improvements thereon, necessary to be taken for the public use in accordance with the provisions of this act, which appraisement shall be subject to ratification by said court, and if at the expiration of thirty days after the passage of this act said court shall not be in session in general or special term, a special term shall be held commencing on the day next thereafter for the purpose of making the appraisement and ratification herein provided for.

SEC. —. That the fee-simple of all premises so appropriated for public use, of which an appraisement shall have been made under the order and direction of said court, shall upon payment to the owner or owners, respectively, or to such person as shall be authorized to receive the same for any such owners, of the appraised value; or in case the said owner or owners refuse or neglect for fifteen days after the appraisement of the cash value of said lands and improvements by said court to demand the same from the Secretary of the Interior, upon depositing the said appraised value in said court to the credit of such owner or owners, respectively, be vested in the United States; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and required to pay to the several owner or owners, respectively, or to such person authorized as aforesaid, the appraised value of the several premises, as specified in the appraisement of said court, or pay into court by deposit, as hereinbefore provided the said appraised values.

SEC. —. That said court may direct the time and manner in which possession of the property condemned shall be taken or delivered, and may, if necessary, enforce any order or issue any process for giving possession. The cost occasioned by the inquiry and assessment shall be paid by the United States; and, as to other costs which may arise, they shall be charged or taxed, as the court may direct.

SEC. —. That no delay in making an assessment of compensation or in taking possession shall be occasioned by any doubt which may arise as to the ownership of the property, or any part thereof, or as to the interests of the respective owners; but in such cases the court shall require a deposit of the money allowed as compensation for the whole property or the part in dispute. In all cases, as soon as the United States shall have paid the compensation assessed, or secured its payment by a deposit of money under the order of the court, possession of the property may be taken.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Interior shall report to Congress at the commencement of the next session a detailed statement of all the proceedings under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say a word. I would not ask the Senate to take this on my advice; but it has been prepared on the basis of the most carefully considered law we ever passed in the Senate after long discussion and many amendments made in the Senate. I refer to the provision for taking the land that was taken at the corner of Pennsylvania avenue and the Capitol. It was prepared by a legal gentleman and it has been read carefully by the junior Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] and I believe it will be found critically accurate from beginning to end, so that it will be safe for Senators to accept it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont what is the estimate of the cost. I noticed in the reading that it appropriates "the sum of money necessary for this purpose." That might be $50,000,000 or $1,000,000 or $100,000.

Mr. MORRILL. As I stated in my remarks, I have here the written contracts of over half the parties who own the property in these squares, and as near as we can estimate the amount, the whole proposed cost will be a round million of dollars. That will be the whole cost of the six squares.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If $1,000,000 is the sum that is estimated, there ought to be some limit in the bill. I ask the Senator if he is willing to limit the amount to $1,000,000?

Mr. MORRILL. I have never seen a bill for the condemnation and appraisal of land limited in that way, and I am not inclined to accept any such provision.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will $2,000,000 suit the Senator? I want to get some limit fixed. I do not want to have the whole Treasury opened to the owners of these lots over here.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to the Senator from West Virginia an inquiry which his experience will enable him to answer for me a great deal better than I can answer it for myself. If it be true, as the Senator from Vermont says, that more than half the property is bonded to the United States so that we are to acquire it for the price agreed upon, will not that be very likely to establish the price for the rest?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Not after it is known that the Government wants it.

Mr. HOAR. It will fix the price which the appraisers will be very likely to be governed by; it will fix the market value, it being all classed together. And would not the putting in of a limit that was too small defeat the bill? If you put in a limit too large, would it not be likely to swell the price up to the limit and would it not enhance the price?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The experience of the Government in almost anything it has to buy, after it is known that it wants it, is to pay three or four or a dozen and sometimes twenty prices. I have no idea that a million dollars or $2,000,000, if the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is to be unlimited in amount, would pay for what is contemplated. I think we ought to move very slowly in this business.

Mr. MORRILL. I am too hoarse to make myself heard, but I would be perfectly willing to limit it to $1,200,000. I have no idea that it is going to the extent of a million dollars, but I would be perfectly willing to limit it to $1,200,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I move that instead of appropriating the amount necessary for this purpose, it be limited to $1,200,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia moves to limit the amount to $1,200,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. All around me I hear it said that a million dollars is abundant, and I suggest that the limit ought to be fixed at a million. Let it be "not to exceed $1,000,000." I make that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. A million dollars for what? In other words beginning and ending where? Does the Senator understand?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I must answer the Senator from New York that I do not understand yet, and I do not think the Senate fully understands how much; but if we get the price to be paid limited to $1,000,000, then we can go to work probably and understand how much ground we are going to get for the $1,000,000. I believe the amendment ought to be printed, and each one be able to see what it is before we act on it. I hope it will be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. That may be; but I suggest to the Senator that in fixing the limit, thereby meaning the value of the land, it would be well enough to know the land of which we are speaking about the value. I do not understand whether it is proposed to begin on one corner of the square and run all the way across to Pennsylvania avenue, which would be the width of the entire Capitol from north wing to south wing, thereby leaving East Capitol street divide the two blocks, or whether the purpose is to take the block on the north side of East Capitol street or on the south side. If the purpose be to take the whole, unless we are going to close a street which is lined on both sides with very valuable improvements, the Library building cannot be put opposite the center building of the Capitol, if I remember the location aright. If that street is to be closed and the center or the side of the building fixed there, it would be a building corresponding with or counterbalancing the Capitol in respect of its location.

If East Capitol street is to be left, then the building must be put either north or south of it, and in either event must stand opposite one of the wings of the Capitol; and in such an event I can see no object, if East Capitol street is to stand, in buying all the land on the south side of East Capitol street if the building is to stand on the north side or all the land on the north side if the building is to stand on the south side.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The amendment which we adopted includes both these squares.

Mr. CONKLING. Then what is to become of East Capitol street?

Mr. VOORHEES. Before the Senator from New York came in an amendment was made striking out "reservation No. 35 of the public grounds, known as Judiciary Square," and a provision inserted that the building should be erected "on squares 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, and 731 east of the Capitol, and between B street north and B street south and First street east and Second street east."

Mr. CONKLING. Then that embraces the block both north and south of East Capitol street.

Mr. VOORHEES. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Then may I ask the Senator from Indiana is it proposed to obliterate East Capitol street?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. To Second street.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I ask—and I see that I am more exactly on the point of the Senator from West Virginia than I was aware of—the Senator from Indiana whether this million dollars, if million it be, is to pay for all the damages in prostrating the buildings on East Capitol street and removing them?

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from New York is asking me upon a subject that I am not entirely responsible for.

Mr. CONKLING. I am aware of that.

Mr. VOORHEES. For this is not my bantling; but I understand the million of dollars, or the $1,200,000, as it may be, covers everything in the way of procuring the ground and making it ready for the foundation to be laid, that is to say, purchasing the ground and removing the present buildings on the ground and shutting up the streets.

Mr. CONKLING. And if the Senator will pardon me for a little more curiosity, after the street has been shut up the width of these blocks which are to be taken, what is to become of East Capitol street beyond that? Is that to remain open?

Mr. VOORHEES. It will evidently stop the street a little further east than it does now.

Mr. INGALLS. Why not just run an arch through the building?

Mr. CONKLING. Why not have an arcade? There might be an arcade under this Library.

Mr. VOORHEES. That might be.

Mr. CONKLING. That would furnish a vent for East Capitol street. As I understand it, then, East Capitol street as far back as may be is to be wiped out. In other words we are "to make a solitude and call it peace" on East Capitol street.

Mr. VOORHEES. As far east as this new public ground may go.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, this is a very large codicil that the Senator from Vermont proposes to a very short will; and it comes here in manuscript. It proposes to provide for the purchase or condemnation of property that I thought it was said would cost $500,000, although I did not think that would cover it. Then it was said a million, now it is said $1,200,000, and the Senate has had no opportunity whatsoever to investigate this proposed amendment, to scrutinize it, to see whether the steps it proposes are such as will secure to the Government a good title for the land which is proposed to be taken.

The Senator from Vermont says he has followed the example of the condemnation of the property at the foot of Capitol Hill, on Pennsylvania avenue. I beg leave to say that that was not a very well drawn bill for the subject of the condemnation of property, and that if the condemnation of that property had been contested by any property-holder there would have been very great difficulty in maintaining any such law at all. I undertake to say that it is extremely questionable whether that is a compliance with the Constitution, which declares that private property shall not be taken except for public use and by due process of law; and I do not think that is a good bill to follow at all.

But another thing is to be considered. You never will get this property at any reasonable rate, and I do not know that you will even then, unless you vest in somebody, the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Interior, or reserve the power yourselves, to refuse to take the property if the appraisement is too high. That is the only security that a State ever has that it will get a property at a reasonable rate; and no such sections as these ought to be adopted at all without the distinct reservation of the right, either in the President or in the Secretary of the Interior or reserved to Congress, to refuse to take the property if it is appraised too high.

Such a measure is not a thing to be put through in this hot haste. I do not know that anything I can say will stop it for a moment. The Senate seems to be bent upon it, and it may be that it is bound to go through; but I for one protest against the adoption of these seven or eight sections in manuscript without a single Senator except the Senator who offers them ever having read ten lines of either of them.

Mr. WINDOM. I voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, because I preferred that location to the one proposed by the committee; but I do not believe that is the right location. I do not believe that we should close up East Capitol street. I do not believe that it is the right location for various reasons, but I think that on the north side and on the south side of this Capitol there is property which is available for this purpose which can be had vastly cheaper than that at the east end, and is in every respect, notwithstanding the jokes perpetrated upon it by my friend from Vermont, more desirable for this building than that proposed by this amendment to be taken. So long as the Government does not appropriate for the purchase of the property at either end of the Capitol, north and south, the nuisance which is offensive to everybody who looks upon it will remain there, and the next half century probably will not see it cleared away.

Now, I believe we can accomplish two purposes: we can beautify these grounds by removing this nuisance from the north and the south, and at the same time secure a more desirable place for this building and perhaps a judiciary building which ought to be constructed before long.

I believe that the proposition now pending is also a very unsafe one, and I cannot vote for it even if it applied to my pet locality. I will not vote any general authority to take property, appropriating whatever money it may cost. We have had some little experience in this capital on that subject. Some years ago the Chair will recollect there was a break-neck corner at the end of Pennsylvania avenue adjoining the Capitol on the west, where the sharp point of the block projected into the street and it was almost impossible to get around it. Authority was given to condemn so much as might be necessary to widen the street; and a little space, perhaps half the size or quarter the size of the Senate Chamber, was taken. I do not believe it was half the size of this Chamber; and if I am not mistaken in the amount—the Senator from West Virginia thinks I state it too low—we had to pay $50,000 for that little plat of land. If that be true, and I think I am not mistaken in it, what will it cost to take two or three blocks east of the Capitol? I think the Senator from Vermont will do well not to accept a limitation of $2,000,000 if this bill is to pass in this form.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My friend will allow me. I understand the space taken on the west front was not a fourth or a fifth or perhaps one-tenth the size of this Chamber, and it cost the Government $90,000.

Mr. WINDOM. I thought I was stating it entirely within limits both as to the size of the ground and the amount of the damages paid.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say further that it increased the value of property there from appearances, and yet the Government paid $90,000 for it, I understand, and perhaps there were not twenty feet square in the whole ground taken.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Will the Senator state how much?

Mr. MORRILL. I think about fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Within ten minutes I was informed that the sum paid was $90,000. If the Senator knows it was $50,000, of course he is right; but the space that was taken was very small, perhaps not more than twenty feet square.

Mr. WINDOM. And the buildings upon it were of very little value. Mr. President, I am not willing to place ourselves in the hands of any assessors that may be appointed to condemn this property. The only thing in my judgment for the Senate now to do is to appoint some committee, or in some way or other provide for ascertaining what the property on the north, on the east, and on the south side of the Capitol can be obtained for, and then at the next session of Congress, when we have the offer and have these different localities bidding against each other, we shall be enabled to act intelligently on the subject. I admit the necessity of a library building, but I do not think it is wise to rush headlong into this matter and pay any number of millions that somebody chooses to assess as damages for the property that everybody wants to sell.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask my friend from Minnesota is not the method of taking property for public use in his State and in most of the States of the Union precisely that to which he now objects; that is, where a highway is laid out the public take possession of it and afterward the damage on the value of the land taken is submitted to a jury?

Mr. WINDOM. That is the rule as far as I know in most of the States; but at the same time I have given the Senate a little item of experience in this city which I think ought to deter us from hot haste in repeating it.

Mr. HOAR. Was not that a case in which the street was right opposite the entrance to the Capitol, making it the most valuable part of the city, and where a three-cornered piece of land was taken which spoiled several lots?

Mr. WINDOM. We took a few feet.

Mr. HOAR. It was not the value of the land, but the damage to the lots that we paid for.

Mr. WINDOM. The damage to the land! The lots are worth very much more, because of our widening the street, than they were before we took them; and I am informed that the money paid by the Government for that little piece of land built the new houses that now stand at this point, and I apprehend it more than built them. The old houses upon it were worth nothing almost. There was no great amount of damage paid for buildings, but it was because we were in the power of somebody, and when the Government is in anybody's power it is sure to pay for it.

I am not willing to place ourselves in the power of anybody. Let us provide some means to ascertain what the property north and south and east of the Capitol can be obtained for, and next session we shall be prepared to appropriate money for the building. If all these parties understand that they will bid against each other, as they all want to sell, you will undoubtedly get the property at reasonable prices; you will get rid of these nuisances north and south; you will beautify your grounds, and when you place your Library building on either wing you will have a setting to this Capitol which will make it one of the most beautiful spots on earth.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I am one of the few who voted against the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, because I knew it would involve us in a cost that nobody now thinks of before we got a beginning made. It not only closes up East Capitol street, but it closes up two streets on each side of East Capitol street. I hope by to-morrow morning, if the vote is not taken to-night, a plan will be made of the blocks embraced in the proposition of the Senator from Vermont; and it will show that A street north and A street south, as well as East Capitol street, are both closed by this proposition; and we shall have suits for damages against us by the people who have built good blocks of houses beyond, because we have shut them off from their communication with the Capitol and closed up the only means they had without going around squares to get where they now can go.

You will find before you are through with it that you have a great deal bigger job on hand than you are contemplating, and the plat will show it, which now lies before the Senator from Vermont. There are to be two streets closed up on each side of East Capitol street as well as East Capitol street, and fine blocks of buildings shut off from access to the rest of the city and to the Capitol by the proposition now made.

I agree with the Senator from Minnesota. I do not know anything about the owners, but there is a whole block here with hardly a house on it that may be built up by shanties or something else, and we may have a few to take away; nearly three acres running down to the Baltimore and Ohio depot, with railroads all around it, that would furnish every facility for this Library in close contiguity to the Capitol, where it would be an adjunct to it, and a building to accommodate the General Post-Office might be built on the corresponding space on the other side and the present General Post-Office building surrendered to the Interior Department and made the Patent Office. We shall have to do something very soon for the Department of the Interior, for it needs both the present Post-Office building and the present Interior building. It is now renting a large number of buildings.

We could adorn the Capitol in that way at less cost perhaps than it will take to get possession of the grounds now sought to be taken, and we could thus occupy both the squares on the flanks of the Capitol, and come very near putting up one of the buildings before we can make a start under the other proposition. That is my judgment about it. I voted against the proposition of the Senator from Vermont, and shall vote to lay the bill on the table, and shall do anything to get clear of such a course as I think the Senate is not now aware of.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I voted for the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, because I preferred the locality designated by his amendment to that reported by the committee, and because also I am willing to say that I think, all things considered, it is about the best locality we can select at all. I therefore am in favor of that locality, as I am at present advised, in preference to any other; that is, I think it the best locality. But after the remarks made by the Senator from Ohio I think it proper to say, as one of the gentlemen who voted for that amendment, that I have no idea myself of rushing headlong into this matter so as to enable gentlemen who own a little ground on the spot designated to imagine that they are going to make fortunes out of the Government in hot haste. I do not propose, so far as my vote is concerned, to put the Government in the power of those gentlemen, nor in the power of assessors selected in this District. I think on that matter we ought to go carefully; we ought to protect the Government. I think, as the Senator from Minnesota has very correctly said, that the little experience we have had in regard to the point of ground at the corner of the Avenue and the Capitol grounds, ought to teach us a lesson of caution on this subject. I do not feel inclined to admit that we have no power to prevent gentlemen who own this ground from being guilty of extortion upon the Government. I do not think we are powerless in that regard. I think with proper care we can protect ourselves and get the property at a fair value, and from a little inquiry I have made, and a little survey of the ground, and comparing the prices with prices in other parts of the city, and with the prices that property on those blocks sold for before this agitation began, I am satisfied that $1,000,000 is a very extravagant estimate. I am willing to prefer that spot of ground to any other, but I think the remarks made by Senators to the effect that we ought to be cautious and not place the Government in the absolute power of the owners are wise.

I do not myself see why we are compelled to select assessors from the freeholders of this District. I think of all assessors in the United States they are the most unfavorable, the ones we ought not to select. That is my judgment. I think we have a right to select assessors from anywhere in the United States. There is nothing in the Constitution or laws of the country which requires that the assessors should be selected in this District. What shall be the best plan of protecting the Government in this matter I do not know. I am willing, in view of what the Senator from Ohio has said and in the spirit of what has been said by the Senator from Minnesota, to say that I wish to go carefully upon this subject and not place the Government in the power of the owners of this property.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I think that if gentlemen had examined this they would have saved themselves from some mistakes. It is not proposed to shut up the streets on the north or south side or on the east side. There will be a street running entirely around this and also a passage-way, the same as there is now on First street, across. It is only proposed to acquire these six squares, or two whole squares and four triangular pieces and the streets between them and the alleys, so that this Library can be placed at one end or the other or in the center. If it should be placed exactly in the center, it would close up East Capitol street; but if it were placed upon one end and the other end reserved for a Supreme-Court building, it would leave East Capitol street open.

So far as a million of dollars is concerned, I think it is all that the land will cost. I judge from the contracts that have been signed by over half the owners. There are some who have included in their estimates damages that they suffered years and years ago from the grading of the street. There are others whose names could not be obtained because they were absent, and there were some that put so high prices that their figures were unacceptable—believed to be exorbitant.

Now, in order to satisfy my friends from West Virginia and Georgia and Minnesota that there is to be no humbug, no scheme for profit, I am willing to provide at the end, "and this shall not exceed $1,000,000."

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the vote taken a few minutes ago indicated, as far as I can understand it, a decided sentiment on the part of the Senate in favor of the building being on Capitol Hill over and above the choice indicated by the majority of the committee in favor of Judiciary Square.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me a moment? I desire to move that when the Senate adjourn to-night it will be to meet on 23d instant at eleven o'clock, to-morrow being Washington's birthday. To-morrow is the 22d of February, and I think an anniversary that we all ought to keep.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield for that purpose?

Mr. GARLAND. I cannot yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas declines to yield.

Mr. GARLAND. I understand that what I have stated is about all that was signified by the vote of the Senate a few minutes since. I voted among the thirty-nine for the amendment. It is not worth while to state the reasons.

Now, the Senator who makes the minority report brings in an amendment to this bill which is much longer than the bill, and involving principles much more important, and raising questions much more difficult than the bill he seeks to amend. That amendment for the first time is now heard here. I had been led to suppose from the work this committee had bestowed on this subject, that in case of the voting down of their location they had a scheme prepared to carry the measure forward to completion, and that we had nothing to do but sit still to-night and hear this matter explained, and simply vote the measure into a law as far as the action of the Senate could do so. But now the Senator from Vermont comes in with an amendment six or seven pages long in manuscript raising all these nice questions of taking property for public use with compensation or without compensation, as the case may be, and prescribing in the amendment the machinery to do this thing, which upon the face of it is incomplete, incomplete and imperfect; raising also the intricate question, difficult at all times, of the power to condemn a street that has been dedicated already to the use of the people.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to explain on that very point what authority Congress has to close a street already dedicated to the public?

Mr. GARLAND. I shall not undertake to explain it, because I believe that we have no such authority. We are asked by the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to do what the Senator from Texas very properly says we cannot do; I am disposed to agree with him as far as that statement goes; but we are asked to do several other things in this amendment, matters which always raise dispute and controversy, and which have given rise to as much litigation in this country as anything else. I do not think it right and proper, and I do not think it fair, (though I say that in no offensive sense,) to call on the Senate to take these important steps to-night on this amendment, and that, too, when the amendment has made its appearance now for the first time in manuscript.

I shall move to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to prepare a bill complete in itself to carry out the selection indicated by the voice of the Senate for the location on Capitol Hill instead of Judiciary Square, so that the matters contemplated by this amendment may be embodied fully and perfectly in the bill that is to come back from the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish to suggest to my friend that if he recommits at all, he allow the whole subject to go to the committee.

Mr. GARLAND. The whole subject with instructions.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But why confine them to that particular place? Why not let them take into consideration any other place?

Mr. GARLAND. As I understand from their report they have considered various other places. I am willing to modify the motion to recommit the whole subject to the committee with instructions that they report a bill embodying all these views, whatever selection they may make, as to the condemnation and process of acquiring the land.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, we are now verging on the fourteenth year of measures in regard to a Library building. I have witnessed this incipient movement often heretofore. One Senator rises and says, "You had better go slow," as if anybody ever did go fast on this subject. The Senator from New York invokes us to go slow; do not be rash; do not act hastily, as if anybody on earth ever saw Congress do anything except go slow and do nothing on the subject of the Library.

When this joint select committee first got together, if the Senator from Vermont will pardon me for speaking out of doors, I commenced pressing for speedy action, and a member of the committee said, "You seem to be in a hurry; I protest against this haste." "Why," said that distinguished gentleman, a member of the committee—I will not say who he was—"I have been pondering on this subject for the last thirteen years." "Of course you have," said I, "and nothing but pondering, no action; I want action."

Now we are confronted with the question and with the dire necessity of the Library, and we hear nothing more than "let us go slow," "take time." The distinguished Senator from Ohio addresses himself to finding out how not to go ahead, but how to stand still; and the Senator from Georgia agrees with him with his magnificent persuasive capacity; and then the Senator from Kentucky comes forward and says that there is a side-show over here on the slope of the hill where it ought to be built, but it ought not to be done now and in haste; and the Senator from Minnesota, because he has not got exactly his spot, thinks there is great danger in this bill. And then the eminent legal mind of my friend on my right from Arkansas arraigns the committee by supposing that the committee—I presume he means by that the majority—would have provided for its own defeat and would have a bill ready when its bill was voted down, which we brought forward for him to vote on. It is my custom to provide for victory and not for defeat. I confess it was like defeat this evening—not much, for I cared not a great deal about the question of locality. I am not a mere school-boy who must have a thing my way or no way. I am perfectly willing for the Senate to determine where this building shall go, and then have it go there. I do not want it to stop at the very moment that it gets started and somebody halloes "Halt! Go slowly! Be cautious!"

The Senator from Arkansas criticised the committee for not having prepared a line of retreat in case the bill was voted down which I had the honor to report. The bill itself has not been voted down except in one particular, and that was a particular of smallest consequences to my mind, and that was as to the locality. He thinks we should have had another bill prepared for that contingency. Very well, the minority of this committee did have another bill prepared, and I do not know any other way than that which he has pursued here to-night. He offered it as an amendment. It comes from one of the most experienced legislators in the body, experienced in both branches of Congress, with whom I served in the other end of the Capitol many years ago, and who had been in service ten years before that, and he has been in continuous service ever since. Surely it is not exactly to be assumed that he has presented an immature and unconsidered piece of legislation on a subject so familiar to him. He has brought forward the amendment carefully prepared by himself and carefully prepared in connection with other men of experience and legal ability.

I say here that I have as little to fall back on as anybody, but what little reputation I have I am willing to stake it all on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, that there is no job, no scheme, no steal in it, that nobody need be putting up his hands and shaking his head and telling us to go slow for fear we shall destroy this Government by adopting an amendment providing for the condemnation of property and the building of a library building.

The Senator from Arkansas, of whose legal ability nobody in this world has a higher opinion than I have, re-enforced and braced up by the equally good legal acumen of the Senator from Texas, announces that it is not in the power of this Government to condemn a street when the Senator from Arkansas himself had already voted to do that very thing, if there is any condemnation of streets going on. He voted for the proposition of the Senator from Vermont. The Senator from Vermont brought forward a proposition condemning a certain number of squares by metes and bounds, and it is now said it includes a street. The Senator from Arkansas voted for it. I do not know how the Senator from Texas voted; he tells me he voted with me; then he voted against my friend from Arkansas. My friend from Arkansas, if there is any condemnation of streets going on, has been voting that way, and I have not. I do not apprehend that there is any trouble on that question in the matter involved in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

I am not responsible for the legislation proposed by the Senator from Vermont, because I did not favor the purchase of the ground; yet as it has been decided for by a vote of 39 to 7, I beg the Senate to go on and do something, send this bill over to the House, and let us move forward.

We have nearly four hundred thousand volumes of books, and I shall move to shove them out in the streets and burn them to fertilize the fields with their ashes, rather than see them lying there in the disgraceful condition they are now, in boxes and nooks and piled on top of each other. The Senator from Georgia says he thinks that is the best disposition to make of most of them. There comes the would-be censor of the press; the Senator from Georgia is to determine what books ought to be in the Library and what not. I am sometimes inclined to think so too; but again somebody differs with me, thinks that some books are better than I think them. Neither the Senator from Georgia nor I can determine the boundary line of what shall be kept and what shall be destroyed.

Macaulay in preparing his history availed himself of placards, of the gutter hand-bills of the times, of ballads, of the wheat and the chaff, the trashy and the good, so that he might get at the current of the popular mind. This is the first time I have heard suggestions on the Library question, to suppress a certain class of books. I was in a street-car the other day, and was approached with the utmost dogmatism by some gentleman; he had a solution for it. Said I: "You want to be censor; you want to determine what books shall be received." Who is to do this thing? Who is to say what books shall be received? Who is to say when a copyrighted volume is put in the Library that that shall be thrown out? Who is to do this? We must take the products together, and from both the chaff and the wheat judge whether the world is progressing, see what the mass of mankind are doing. When I hear it suggested "burn up the books," that is my answer.

Now I do hope and trust and pray that the Senate will not go to recommitting this question. If ever a work was done conscientiously, this committee has done its work; we have brought it and laid it before you, and if the Senate is not competent to take up a small question like this and buy a little piece of ground and provide for a public building on it, I think we ought to think of abdicating our functions. I hope as these minutes are going by, that each Senator will determine that something shall be done out of the usual way. This question has been before us and money has been spent every year. This motion to recommit, and recommit with instructions, means postponement till next year. That means when we come in like beasts of burden with our panniers on each side of us, with this load on us again next year and dump it down in the same presence, you will go over the subject again and it will meet the same fate, and somebody will get up and say, "I hope nothing will be done in haste; we had better recommit this question back to the committee with instructions." So it has gone, and so the subject has been pondered for thirteen years, and I expect it will be pondered over for thirteen years more unless we can break this gorge, as it were, of objections and make a little progress.

I am ready for my part to vote on the proposition made by the Senator from Vermont, that this property shall be condemned in the usual way. I happen to know that his amendment is taken from the most careful legislation on that subject in the records of the Government, and his proposition that the cost shall not exceed $1,000,000 is about as reasonable as we shall get it. I should not have voted in the first place to pay a million dollars for ground when we own ground already; but as this august body by such a majority has decided otherwise, I shall vote for the proposition made by the Senator from Vermont so as to have something done.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, what is the motion pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to recommit the bill with instructions.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator withdraw that a moment that I may offer an amendment?

Mr. GARLAND. I withdraw the motion if the Senator will renew it.

Mr. KERNAN. I move that this proviso be added to the first section of the amendment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from New York that there is an amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont pending, to which the Senator from West Virginia submitted an amendment. The amendment suggested by the Senator from New York may be reported for information, but it is not now in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont is the principal amendment, to which the Senator from West Virginia offered his.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps the Senator from West Virginia will accept the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the first section it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the total cost of the lands hereinbefore described shall not exceed $1,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I will say to the Senator from New York that that will hardly cover the point. It is not only the ground but the buildings and consequential damages, if there should be any, that I want to cover. I wish the whole cost not to exceed a million of dollars.

Mr. KERNAN. If it is not in order, I can say, while on the floor, all I want to say. When you speak of the cost of land it includes the buildings on it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I would rather have it differently.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to say to the Senate before the vote on the motion to recommit, that this committee spent a great deal of time in investigating the subject before this report was made. The best information we could get was that these owners thought this property was worth from $1,200,000 to $1,500,000. After the report was made by the chairman of the committee some persons did make an effort to see if they could not get propositions, so that this property would not cost as much as we supposed. I am satisfied now, and ought to say so, that the Senate may vote understandingly, that we shall not be able to get by agreement the land required for the Library east of the Capitol for less than a million of dollars. I think the Senate should now, if they mean to recommit this bill, before they recommit it, decide whether they are willing to take that site at a million of dollars if we can get it, and I think they should limit the amount to that. That is the only way we shall be able to get it at that sum.

The majority of the committee reported in favor of Judiciary Square because we did not believe Congress would appropriate what it would cost according to our information then to get the site east of the Capitol; but very likely if the Senate shall say that they are willing to take that site, but not at a cost of more than a million of dollars, we shall be able to get it by agreement, and I fear that if we go to an appraisement the value will be by the evidence put far above that. Therefore I hope before the motion to recommit is put we shall have the sense of the Senate whether they will or will not limit the price at which we will take the site east of the Capitol to a million dollars for all the land and all the damages, and I will make it read that way.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this motion is debatable, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Indiana stated that he did not believe there was any "scheme" in the proposal offered by the Senator from Vermont in reference to the purchase of this land. So far as the word "scheme" has any improper meaning, I fully agree with him; but I do believe that there is something in this matter that has not yet been disclosed to the Senate. I received in my mail a few days ago a beautiful lithographed scheme or ground plan of a proposed extension of the Capitol in connection with the construction of the Library building. It represented the entire east front with the grounds as they now exist and as they would exist when this contemplated purchase was embraced within their limits, and in this lithographed map or plat directly east of the Senate extension stood the proposed Library building, and upon the other end of this proposed purchase directly east of the House extension stood a proposed judiciary and law library building of similar proportions. Now I ask the Senator from Vermont whether or not this proposed purchase does not contemplate and intend the securing of land not only for the structure of a Congressional Library but for the ultimate future construction of a judiciary building with a law library, also of similar proportions and perhaps greater expenditure?

Mr. MORRILL. All I can say is that the present bill does not contemplate taking all of the land between First and Second streets and between B street north and B street south, but it only contemplates so far as I know for the present, and for many years to come perhaps, the building of a library. Ultimately I have no doubt that the Supreme Court will require a building and a law library connected therewith, and if it should, this purchase that we make now will furnish ample provisions for it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator's response is very ingenuous. He states that the bill as amended contemplates the purchase of this land and only the erection of a building for a Congressional Library, but he does admit that the demands of the Supreme Court and of the law library may at some future period require the construction of a building for which this purchase will afford an eligible site. No one can doubt, after the very judicious and guarded and cautious statement of the Senator from Vermont, that we have at last discovered what this contemplated purchase is for. It is not needed for the Library.

Mr. MORRILL. I stated all of this in my speech.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not needed for the Library, and we are asked, in a bill to provide for the purchase of land for the construction of a Library, to buy an enormous extent of valuable property, involving not only the condemnation of land, but the destruction of valuable edifices thereon for purposes that may never occur in the future.

I think that this subject requires more deliberate consideration, and if the Senate does not agree to recommit the bill, for which perhaps there may be no necessity, at least it should be postponed until to-morrow, that the bill may be printed and that we may know that about which we are called upon to vote.

Mr. MORGAN. If in order I will offer a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not now in order; there is already an amendment to an amendment pending.

Mr. WINDOM. Let it be read for information.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that my proposed substitute be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the land and the structures thereon which may be purchased or condemned under this act shall not exceed in cost —— dollars, nor shall such land be accepted or paid for by the United States until the President shall have approved the price at which the land is purchased or condemned as being the just and reasonable value thereof, for the purposes of a library building and grounds.

Mr. MORGAN. I sympathize fully with the utterances of the Senator from Indiana this evening as to the necessity of maturing this measure in some form. The Senate have decided against Judiciary Square and in favor of a location east of the Capitol. The Senator from Vermont has introduced in the form of an amendment to the bill a proceeding for the condemnation of this land if it cannot be purchased. I have no doubt that that amendment perhaps is as well worded and thorough a proceeding as we can adopt, although I have not had the opportunity of studying it in print, which I very much desire; but I think that we should go on now and mature our plans for the erection of this Library building and put the commissioners at work upon it.

I have purposely left in the amendment which I propose to submit at the proper time a blank as to the cost of the ground and the structures upon the ground which is to be purchased or condemned. I have done that in order that the Senate may be able to give a distinct expression in reference to the amount of money that it is willing to expend for the purchase of the ground, for the Senate may find itself compelled to defer even the building of the Library, great as the necessity for it may be, in consequence of the high price of lands surrounding the Capitol east where the Senate had decided the new building is to be placed.

Let the Senate fix the amount; let it be done by a vote upon various suggestions as they arise in the minds of Senators as to the amount we are willing to expend, and in that way we shall make some progress in the completion of this bill; and after we have fixed the amount then we can take up the proceeding which the Senator from Vermont has offered here to-night, or some such proceeding, and vote upon that, so as to find the means of condemnation in the event we cannot make the purchase at a reasonable price.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. CONKLING. What has become of the motion to recommit?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That has been withdrawn.

Mr. GARLAND. I renew the motion to recommit the whole subject to the select committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the bill be recommitted to the select committee with instructions.

Mr. CONKLING. With what instructions? I think it had better go without instructions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Arkansas repeat the instructions?

Mr. GARLAND. I am perfectly willing to make the ordinary motion to recommit the whole subject to the committee.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I think the Senators who have this business now in hand are just as competent to take charge of it and go on and finish it as the committee to whom it will be referred again. We have done all that we can do; the Senate is thoroughly intelligent upon this question; and there is but one thing that can result from its recommittal, and that is delay. We can bring no new light; we cannot illuminate any other localities; we can do nothing more than has been done. All that will be accomplished by the recommittal will be delay; and I hope the Senate will not recommit the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. If the bill shall not be recommitted (and I certainly hope the Senate will not recommit it at this late hour) it is probable that the recommitment means, and perhaps is intended to defeat any action in relation to a Library building at the present session. If it should not be recommitted I would be perfectly willing if it were in my power to accept even the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, provided he puts in the same amount as is proposed by the Senator from New York, $1,000,000. It was intended as a matter of course that this should cover the cost of the ground and the buildings thereon.

Mr. MORGAN. I will say to the honorable Senator that I am not willing to pay $1,000,000 for this ground. I think it is an extortionate and exorbitant price, and I am not willing to pay it.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the Senator is mistaken. It is a very large amount of ground and a very large amount of buildings, but the buildings will be sold and can be sold for a sufficient amount to grade the ground and perhaps to do considerable toward the foundation.

Mr. THURMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Vermont to have withdrawn his amendment?

Mr. MORRILL. No, I have not.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope it will not be acted upon to-night, and I say this in all seriousness. I want to offer in perfect good faith several amendments to the amendment whenever it comes up; and if the motion to recommit should prevail then I want the committee to hear what are the suggestions I have to make in regard to that amendment. For instance, if I understand the amendment from reading it hastily in manuscript, the judgment of the five commissioners who are to make the assessment is to be final and conclusive.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator is mistaken; it is to be ratified by the court.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly there should be some right of exception both on the part of the Government and on the part of the property-holders. But that is not all. There is no notice provided for to owners of the property whose names are unknown, by publication or in any other manner whatever.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator is again mistaken. He will find that they are to be notified by summons or by publication.

Mr. THURMAN. Not at all. They are to be notified so far as they are known, if I have read it aright. If I am wrong, it only shows how little is understood of this amendment and how little can be understood unless we can look at it in print. If I have read it aright, the notice is to be given to those whom the court shall prescribe; they are to receive notice; but no notice is provided by publication or otherwise, as is usual, to non-residents or to those whose names are not known.

Again, there is no provision to secure the Government against exorbitant assessments by putting it in the power of the Government to say "we will not take this land at such a valuation." That is a power that ought never to be given up.

But I do not want to delay the Senate. I am perfectly willing that the bill shall be recommitted in order that the committee may, after having heard the debate, bring in a proper bill. If it is not recommitted, then I hope the Senate will proceed to the regular order, and that this amendment may be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, in full sympathy with the honorable Senator from Indiana, I shall nevertheless vote to recommit the bill to the committee. The honorable Senator says, and I also can testify to its truth, that he has taken first and last a great deal of trouble and given a great deal of labor to this subject; and he says most naturally that he wants an end made of it, and that he does not want it sent back to his committee for them to wrestle with it again. Ordinarily I think the Senator would be not only warranted in such an appeal to the Senate, but it would be unanswerable. It seems to me not so in this case, and I think I can tell the Senator why it is not so, and why it should not be so.

The committee has been overthrown entirely upon this measure. The Senator from Indiana says only on a question of location. I repeat, the committee has been overthrown utterly upon this measure. Why do I say that? The committee proposed that there should be erected one building, and only one, for a Library on land belonging now to the United States. The Senate has decided that no building shall be erected on that land; that no building shall be erected on any land owned by the United States, but that land shall be purchased, or in the absence of a purchase, under the power of eminent domain it shall be taken as private property and devoted to this public use. Thus immediately become necessary sections four times as long and tenfold as serious and delicate in their provisions as that very simple provision which the committee reported and failed to carry, authorizing only the erection of one building on a part of the ground already belonging to the owner by whom the building was to be erected.

But, Mr. President, this is not all. The Committee on the Library has been overset in its recommendations far beyond the statement I have made. It is proposed now, I confess to my surprise (I voted for the amendment which makes that true which I am going to speak of) not only to buy a large plot of ground or to condemn it by judicial proceedings, on which to erect a Library building, but also to purchase de bene esse, as we would say in court, or to condemn, upon the theory that at some other time, for some other purpose, it might be handy to have it, as much more ground, separated from the ground on which the Library is to stand by a street, isolated from it, not belonging to it, and running all the way from the street which separates it to a mete as far off as the mete in the other direction which bounds the Library lot.

It has become very trite, not only on the stage but in the jests of the day, that a woman at an auction purchased a knocker with a name upon it spelled in a particular way, "because," said she, "were we ever to have a daughter, and were she to be married, and marry a man of that name, how handy it would be to have a knocker in the family already to put on the door!" So we want a Library building, and the Senate has decided that we want a lot on which that Library building may stand; ergo, let us buy or condemn as much land over again in a separate parcel, because in case we should some time or other want to put up some other building, and in case we should want to put it there, how handy it would be, not only to have that ground, but to have had it during all the intermediate years, losing the interest upon it which is tantamount to the rental, and having saved it up to that time for this indefinite purpose which at last has come to pass.

In the case of a private individual, what I have said would hardly be a satire; the transaction might be one of good judgment. Why? Because an individual does not wield the power of eminent domain; because an individual at a future day wanting a lot upon which to erect an addition to his house is absolutely subject to the caprice or the appraisement of the owner of that lot; therefore for him it might be provident at an early day to buy either the refusal or the fee of the land which afterward he might want. But here is an owner, here is a proposed builder, which in this District is absolutely sovereign; whenever it pleases, be it a year or a century hence, it may go out upon any square, no matter what occupies it; may span the public streets, if this theory be a legal one, and condemn not only all the private property it pleases but condemn also that property burdened with a public easement or irrevocably dedicated as a public cemetery or a public way.

Will the Senator from West Virginia, who is reported to have proved before the world his sagacity and foresight in business, will any other Senator of large and varied experience in buying and selling real estate and in profiting by his forecast, tell me what is to be gained in any possible contingency, and who is to gain it, by buying twice as much land as we need, in separate parcels, in order to put a building on one of them?

If we postpone acquiring the rest of it until we want it, whom is this delay to injure? A very enlightened and able Senator in my eye has told me that the injury and loss would fall not upon the Government, but upon those who remained the owners of this unbought property. "Why?" I asked him. His answer was, "Because nobody would venture to build upon it, thinking that the time might come when the Government would need it, and when it would be taken, and therefore this property would not be improved; it would not keep march with the advance of local improvement in Washington." On that theory we are to buy land we do not want now, which we do not know that we ever shall want, for fear if we do not buy it those who own it will sustain a loss; it will not rise in the real estate market and double on their hands. I say to the distinguished chairman who heads the Library Committee, if that kind of benevolence is to enter into this question, if he will go with me I will take him in any direction and show him land in the city of Washington owned no doubt by meritorious people, which will be very likely to stagnate and not to be as buoyant in the future of prices as it might be unless the Government shall buy that land now and indemnify the owners against possible loss.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from New York did not understand me as advancing that theory?

Mr. CONKLING. Far from it. My honorable friend will observe that I was alluding to a suggestion which had been made to me in private by another Senator as we were canvassing this subject in mere personal discourse.

I say in that aspect the other part of this property, one-half of the proposed purchase remaining in the hands of the present owners would not be built upon expensively, for the fear that at some time you are going to condemn it. Very well. Is there, I ask again, any argument tangible, by whatever name you may know it, to be drawn from that in favor of purchasing at a great expense property that you do not want? If so, then you may as well buy it in one part of the city as in another part, because in every part you can find instances of that sort.

On the other hand, will it be argued that when you have placed an imposing structure between East Capitol street and the northern confines of the Capitol grounds, the owners of property on the south of East Capitol street will draw near one to another and say, "Let us conspire to put up this property; let us mark it up; let us double it in value; let us refuse to sell it except at too high a cost?" Is that to be feared? If my honorable friend from Ohio was the person who wanted to buy upon it undoubtedly it must be feared, because he has no power to condemn it, and when he wants it he must buy at the seller's price or he cannot acquire it at all; but inasmuch as the Government is the buyer, inasmuch as the Government has the staff in its own hands every hour and whenever it pleases, under a bill such as I presume the pending sections are, under any adequate bill providing for judicial condemnation at once when it is required, the Government may reduce it to possession and at the price which five of its citizens fix, subject to the approval of a higher officer, executive or judicial, as Congress pleases to say, it can be taken at once, no matter how dizzy or crazy may be the speculative prices at which the owners may hold it.

If this be so, I ask what excuse there is for us, not spending our own money but administering the funds of others, for going and buying not only what we want but what we do not want, and that which the probability of our wanting is so slight that the Senator from Vermont when called upon to know whether that is a part of the plan or not is unwilling to say anything more than that no doubt ultimately a building will be needed for the Supreme Court, and then there will be the land; and in the mean time every year there is a total loss of the interest upon the purchase price and so much more added to that already more than 50 per cent. of all the realty of the District which pays no taxes at all, because the sovereign has absorbed the fee.

Mr. President, voting as I did for this site in preference to Judiciary Square, which vote I should repeat, and for reasons which at any time I could give, (they would be satisfactory at least to me,) I never understood that I was voting to come here on Capitol Hill and, in the first place, pay for all the expensive land needed for this site, and then as a part of the transaction pay for as much more equally expensive property of no use now and bought upon the contingency of some unascertained expectation in the future. I am opposed to it. I do not think we are in a condition to do anything of the sort. I think, as two or three Senators have said, that if we are to have provisions, particularly those as complex and detailed as we heard read from the desk, they had better not only undergo the exposure of printing, but it will not hurt them at all to run through the sieve of a committee and to come here as parts of an entire whole in a single bill, and not as a substitute on the moment for a bill which has been entirely overthrown, superseded in everything except its title and a few of its formal words.

Mr. President, I am for a Library building and a Library. Two Senators have proposed, as a distinguished man, not from Ohio, (he came farther from the east, his name was Omar,) proposed long ago, to burn the books. I believe two Senators have made the suggestion that certain of these surplus books might with great propriety be burned. I am opposed to it. That is because I am not a democrat in politics. The party to which I belong cannot propagate its principles by burning books. That party thrives rather by reading them and causing them to be read by others. Yet I do not complain of these honorable Senators at all. I have no doubt that if my politics were like theirs, I should advocate as they do, burning up those books which so frequently teach men not to agree with them in their political views. I have no sympathy with that idea. I believe in preserving all the books as much as my friend from Indiana does, and I believe in having a building adequate to that purpose.

I will say, as it will take but a moment, that whenever I vote upon my own judgment in this matter, I shall never vote to carry one of these books out of this building. In my belief we want no other building. We do not want to drive the Supreme Court away from the Capitol, as will be done inevitably under this scheme in the end. We do not want to put (as we should have done had we taken Judiciary Square and driven the court there ultimately) the three departments of this Government in three places a mile apart. It is inconvenient in practice, and it is disagreeable to me in sentiment. I would rather see the court stay where it is, and I would rather see the building made, as I have no doubt it could be made economically and with improvement to the beauty and majesty of this pile, to embrace under this roof not only the two Houses of Congress, but the Supreme Court with comfort, and where all the books could stand conveniently on well-protected shelves.

Be that as it may, I am for a Library building. I will go with my honorable friend from Indiana for that either under this roof or some other roof; but I will not vote for expending a million dollars, one-half of it for real estate that nobody pretends we want, when we own already more than half of the real estate of the District; and while not going so to vote I am not sure that I would turn my vote in a direction which is likely to blockade and suffocate the view to this Capitol, every part of it but its dome, from a large body of this city and of the people who live in it, because if East Capitol street is to be closed and the Library building is to be put in the center, it is a perpetual barrier to shut out from here the whole view to the east, and to cut off from all those on the east the view of the Capitol except where that view may strike the dome at an angle so high that intervening objects will not cut it off.

Mr. President, I shall vote, as I have said, to recommit this bill. I hope it will be recommitted; and if the committee is to assent to what the Senate has indicated let it come here with a proposal to buy the block on the south of East Capitol street, if that is what is meant, or on the north, if that is what is meant, with ample room and verge enough for the Library building, but not to buy for the sake of an unascertained contingency as much more land costing as many more dollars.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I had not intended to say an additional word, but the emphasized statement made repeatedly by the Senator from New York, (I will not say with exultation or with pleasure on his part,) that the committee had been not only overthrown but utterly overthrown until nothing of its work was left standing by the Senate except the title of the bill, seems to call for some remark at my hands. The Senator from New York is mistaken. Little as he likes or deserves in fact to follow the lead of anybody, so capable as he is of leading himself, yet he has, perhaps unfortunately, voted now for the first time himself to erect a Library building some place; and it will stand to somebody's credit, whether mine or others, that to-night for the first time in the legislative history I think of this body the Senate has voted to build a Library building, and has indicated the place where. It seems to me that there is some degree of triumph in getting this body to do that; and while I am perfectly willing to feel humble and to be modest in my pretensions, yet on my own behalf and in behalf of the excellent gentlemen who form this committee, I put in a protest against the sweeping annihilation that the Senator from New York desires to visit upon us.

The Senator from New York, together with thirty-eight others, making thirty-nine, did vote to-night on the yeas and nays, "that a fire-proof building for the accommodation of the Library of Congress shall be erected on squares numbered 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, and 731 east of the Capitol, and between B street north and B street south and First street east and Second street east." This will be a milestone in the barren history of this body on the subject of the Library, and if nothing else shall be accomplished by this committee somebody will have pleasure in looking back in years to come and pointing to the singular fact that with only about two hundred thousand volumes unaccommodated in the present Library the Senate of the United States were brought up to the issue and voted to build a Library building, and that the Senator from New York did so himself, and that the measure was not his own.

Not only do we see this fact established, but I state it as a circumstance against recommitting the bill. The Senate has concurred in our labors thus far, that a Library building ought to be built. It is the first time that this body has said it. No matter to me whether it is to be built over yonder or down yonder, the great question was to get this body to say it would build anywhere or do anything. It never came so near doing justice to itself as it has to-night. It has committed itself to the building of this structure some place or other.

But after doing this thing that I warned the Senator from New York and all others not to do, for they could do a better thing by building on ground that already belonged to the Government, the Senator from New York and others who voted the same way now, with rare ability, if not consistency, assail the work of their own hands. They have voted to build this Library building on the square east of the Capitol, and as soon as they have done so they occupy the Senate, I will not say hour after hour but certainly hours, with accusing their work as being the very worst that could be done. I stood here in my feeble way and told them that it would cost a million dollars. I said to the Senator from New York and the Senator from Arkansas and the other Senators, who disregarded what I said then, that to change the location made by the committee would cost a million of money. In defiance and disregard of the warning which I gave, the Senator from New York voted to do that very thing, and now he stands here and preaches us a sermon on the subject of economy; he says it is a bad thing to go and spend money over there. I did not vote to do it and he did. I do not see the consistency of that argument. The Senator from New York voted for the amendment which I have read, and now steps forward and claims credit for having done so, and at the same time says that the work ought not to be done there at all; that it is not right to spend a million dollars there or, if I could understand him, to spend any amount there.

Mr. President, I do not want to prolong this debate; I have said a great deal more to-night than I had intended, but I hope the Senate will not recommit the bill. I think perhaps the better way now would be to let the amendment of the Senator from Vermont be printed and laid upon Senators' tables to-morrow; and let this subject go over and take its chances of being considered hereafter during the present session. There is nothing for the committee to do if the bill is recommitted except to report it back again. If the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is printed and laid on the tables and seen by every Senator we can then take up this subject and discuss it and dispose of it just as well as if the bill had been sent back to the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the course indicated by the Senator from Indiana will be pursued, and that being understood I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GARLAND. My motion to recommit is pending.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator from Delaware to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will say to the Senator from Delaware that the pending motion is that of the Senator from Arkansas to recommit the bill, which will have to be voted upon and which I hope will be voted down. Then I shall move that the amendment to the amendment be printed, so that the Senate can see it; and we can take our chances hereafter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Delaware as moving to adjourn?

Mr. BAYARD. I do not wish to have this measure so abruptly disposed of. I am willing to withdraw the motion to adjourn at the request of several Senators, but it is now past eleven o'clock, and final consideration of the question should not be had in the present condition of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas that the bill be recommitted to the select committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion and allow me to move an amendment to the amendment, that it may be printed also.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the whole bill will be reprinted with the amendments that have been already agreed to and those that have been offered.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is right.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether if we adjourn presently, this bill will be the unfinished business in the morning?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senate adjourns now it will be the unfinished business.

Mr. VOORHEES. To-morrow morning?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To-morrow morning.

Mr. VOORHEES. I should not ask to antagonize the appropriation bill in the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. As a matter of course this bill has to take its chances when that is out of the way.

Mr. CONKLING. What becomes of the cattle bill so called? Somebody must demand the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By a vote of the Senate the pending and all prior orders were postponed, and by a further vote of the Senate the bill under consideration was taken up to-night. If the Senate adjourns to-night in the present condition the Library bill will be the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I hope we shall recommit this bill, and I trust we shall recommit it without instructions.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope we shall not recommit it at all.

Mr. McDONALD. I do not see that there can be any difficulty about this matter. If this bill should be the unfinished business, the chairman of the select committee has said that he will consent, and unquestionably the Senate will agree to it, that it be laid aside.

Mr. VOORHEES. For the appropriation bill.

Mr. McDONALD. For the appropriation bill.

Mr. GARLAND and others addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CONKLING. What becomes of the cattle bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am trying to get the floor on that point now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] has the floor.

Mr. GARLAND. I made the motion to recommit advisedly and in good faith, without any reflection upon the Senator from Indiana or any other living man. What I have heard him and other Senators say convinces me that I was right in that motion. The Senator is mistaken when he says that we have adopted and fixed ourselves upon any one place to erect this building. I simply voted on the parliamentary rule to take the location which has been agreed upon in preference to Judiciary Square; and if it stands as it does now, I shall vote against the bill on its final passage.

I know, of course, how sensitive gentlemen are, and it is a worthy sensitiveness, too, to see bills torn from them that they have worked upon and have them sent back to the committee. I know exactly how it is myself. The present occupant of the chair [Mr. HARRIS] and myself worked for seven months here consecutively upon one proposition, and did not work upon anything else, at least I did not, and I forgot what little I knew about other business. That was upon the yellow-fever bill, and after weeks of discussion here, and no person offering to make that bill any better, some Senator rose and moved to recommit the bill. It was recommitted. I went to my boarding-house that night and felt that I would resign my seat in the Senate, I was feeling so bad about it.

Mr. McDONALD. The Senator did not resign?

Mr. GARLAND. Hear the other part of my statement.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator and I are different. I have no such sensitiveness at all.

Mr. GARLAND. Next came the celebrated Geneva award bill. I worked upon that very much as I had worked with you, Mr. President, on the yellow-fever bill, and I think our report from the Judiciary Committee got about sixteen votes, and that bill was recommitted. Then I felt that I would not resign for spite; that I would stay here and share such treatment with some person else. I sympathize with the Senator in his feeling about having this matter sent back to him; but here we are confronted with one of the most important propositions that have ever been before the Senate since I have been in it, the machinery to condemn property prescribed in this amendment four times as large as the bill itself. It has never been printed. I did not charge it upon the committee that they were derelict in this matter, but I said it seemed strange to me, and it does seem strange to me yet, and still stranger the more I think of it, that whoever had in charge the amendment that we adopted in preference to the location of Judiciary Square did not have a measure printed and perfected as far as could be done that we might examine it in time to see what we were doing in this all-important matter. I made no charge upon the committee of dereliction of duty, but the disclosure that the Senator from Indiana makes in reference to this property, the disclosure the Senator from New York makes, all confirm unmistakably the first impression I had, that painful, or not painful, this matter should go back to the committee and they should overhaul it again. I mean no disrespect, and I hope the Senator from Indiana does not think I mean any disrespect. If so, and if he will tell me how I shall apologize, I will do it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I had no more thought of manifesting the slightest feeling outside of the mere line of debate on that retort of the Senator from Arkansas than I had of doing any other improper and outrageous thing. He has no apology to make to me, but I begin to feel that I have one to make to him.

Mr. GARLAND. Not at all, because I am trying to vindicate the sensitiveness evinced by the Senator in this matter, for I have been through that storm myself and know all about it. Here let me say to Senators that we are preparing in this measure, from the cursory view I took of it, simply to plunge the Government into unexpected and incalculable cost, and into litigation without termination, and it is no disrespect to any gentleman to say that work in reference to a matter of this sort should be overhauled carefully and most minutely.

I have made the motion to recommit under the best advice I was capable of obtaining on the subject or giving to myself, and I think we shall make the best possible haste in having the bill recommitted. If the committee can report the bill to-morrow I shall throw no obstruction in the way of considering it and making an end at least of this case before the Senate. I think it is the highest duty we owe to the Senate to recommit the bill to the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to recommit the bill.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 17, noes 23.

Mr. ALLISON. Now let us have it printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.]

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the bill, together with the amendments pending, embracing that of the Senator from Vermont and all others, be printed, and then I am willing that the Senate may adjourn.

Mr. THURMAN. That is right. I withdraw the motion to adjourn that that may be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the order to print will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to move now that the pending and all previous orders be laid aside, that I may call up the cattle bill and let it go over as the unfinished business for to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. There will be no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to postpone the pending and all prior orders in order to proceed to the consideration of the bill mentioned by him. It will be read by its title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. No. 2097) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, and for the suppression and prevention of contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is to be done with the distinct understanding that the appropriation bill will have preference?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course I shall not antagonize the appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky moves to postpone the pending and all prior orders in order that the Senate may take up the bill which has been read by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. I say to the Senator from Kentucky that he cannot displace the Library bill in that way. The Library bill comes up as the regular order, and cannot be displaced by the bill he moves unless it is done by a vote of the Senate upon full consideration. The Senate is in no condition to decide that question now.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at eleven o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 21, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

CEREMONIES IN MEMORY OF HON. FERNANDO WOOD.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to submit at this time a proposed order, to which I think there will be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered by the House of Representatives, That next Sunday, at three o'clock in the afternoon, be set apart for the observance of the ceremonies in memory of Hon. Fernando Wood, late a member of this House.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection this order will be adopted.

There was no objection.

Some time subsequently the following was adopted:

Ordered, That the Clerk communicate the foregoing resolution to the Senate, with an invitation to the Senate to attend in the House at said hour and participate in said ceremonies.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I move that the call of States today be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. There is no provision in the rules for the suspension of this order; but it can be done by unanimous consent.

Several members objected, and demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the Chair, as required by the rules, will now call the States and Territories in alphabetical order for the presentation of bills and joint resolutions for printing and reference. Under this call joint and concurrent resolutions and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures can be presented and appropriately referred; and resolutions of inquiry directed to heads of the Executive Departments are in order for reference to the appropriate committees, which latter resolutions are to be reported to the House within one week.

JOSIAH GREGG.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair is now recognizing gentlemen to offer bills and resolutions for reference, not to ask unanimous consent. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to refer the joint resolution?

I move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and consent to the conference asked.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COBB. I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 7035) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with amendments; and I move that the bill, together with the amendments of the Senate, be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WELLS. I desire to call up from the Speaker's table the message from the Senate further insisting upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 6730) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, numbered 30 and 31, disagreed to by the House, and asking for a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 30 and 31 and agree to the further conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the amendments of the Senate be read in regard to which it is proposed that the House shall insist upon its disagreement.

The SPEAKER. The request of the Senate will first be read.

Mr. CONGER. The House agreed to a partial report of the conference committee.

The SPEAKER. It was a report from the conference committee in which the conferees agreed in regard to all the amendments of the Senate but two.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that those two amendments be read.

The SPEAKER. The message from the Senate will first be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN SENATE UNITED STATES, February 18, 1881.

Resolved, That the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the bill of the House No. 6730, making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, numbered 30 and 31, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. WALLACE, Mr. BECK, and Mr. WINDOM be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The amendments in relation to which there is a disagreement will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment No. 30:

On page 36 of the bill, strike out lines 4, 5, and 6, as follows:

"That all laws and parts of laws creating or authorizing the commission of ten citizens provided for in the act of April 10, 1869, be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Amendment No. 31:

Page 36, after line 6, insert:

"Expenses of Indian commissioners:

"For the expenses of the commission of citizens, serving without compensation, appointed by the President under the provisions of the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1869, $10,000."

Mr. CONGER. If it will be in order—I do not remember now which motion has precedence—I desire to move that the House recede from its disagreement to the two amendments of the Senate just read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] asks that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the two amendments of the Senate which have been read and agree to the request of the Senate for a further conference. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to said amendments, the effect of which would be to pass the bill without the interposition of a further conference between the two Houses. The Chair thinks that under the rules the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] would take precedence, because the effect of it would be to conclude the action of the two Houses on this bill.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to debate it at all, and I do not know that it is debatable. But I desire very much that the House may understand that by voting to recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment we will still retain the services of a commission who work without any charge from the United States except their traveling expenses.

After careful consideration of this subject for several years, I believe that the United States and the Indians have been the gainers to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars in the value and quality of materials purchased for the Indians, which the members of this commission have had the opportunity of inspecting, reviewing, and controlling, and because the commission have been enabled to advise as to differences, so as to keep faith with the Indians. I believe if there has been any good done under this system a large portion of it is due to the fact that there have been ten men selected from all parts of the United States on account of their honesty, fidelity, and honor to superintend the purchase of materials sent to the Indians, and to see that such materials were not fraudulently exchanged on the way before they reached the Indians.

Mr. WELLS. Mr. Speaker, this matter has been fully discussed before the House as well as in the Senate——

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, in proper form my motion should be, I suppose, that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same?

The SPEAKER. That is the technical form provided for in the rules.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to have my motion in proper form.

Mr. HOOKER. Allow me to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] who has this matter in charge whether I am correct in my understanding as to the position of the question? As I understand, the conferees on the part of the House refused to agree to these amendments of the Senate, and the disagreement of the conference committee being reported to the Senate, that body now insists on its amendments, and asks another conference with the House. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan, I believe, is that the House recede from the amendments which the Senate has insisted upon.

Mr. WELLS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. WELLS. I will do so.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, at the last session when this question was fully debated, this provision appropriating $10,000 for these peace commissioners was struck out by the action of the House; but when the bill went to the Senate that provision, as I understand, was restored. At this session of Congress the Committee on Appropriations, in reporting the Indian appropriation bill, omitted the provision which had been usual since 1869 for the expenses of the peace commission, and reported the bill without any such provision, thus accepting the action of the House taken at the prior session as expressing the judgment of the House and the country that there was no longer any necessity for the continuance of this appropriation of $10,000 annually for the expenses of the peace commissioners.

When this subject was under discussion before, I had occasion to call the attention of the House to the language of the act of 1869, by which there was a specific appropriation to carry into effect certain expenditures of very large amounts which were then provided for with the view of preventing impending difficulties upon the Indian frontier. The object of the act of 1869 was to create this peace commission in and of General Sherman and other officers of the Army, who were invested with the power to expend the large sums of money then appropriated, amounting, I believe, to $250,000 or $300,000. But when these functions were performed, these commissioners were no longer necessary. It was not intended by the act of 1869, nor has there been an expression of opinion anywhere, that this board should constitute a part of the permanent power for managing and controlling Indian affairs. That their counsel and advice in respect to the specific matter for which they were originally created was an advantage, I am not here to deny; but I do say, in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, that whenever we need officers to perform functions of this sort we ought to create such officers by permanent law; they ought to be under bonds, and ought to be amenable primarily to the Interior Department, and afterward to Congress. I can see no reason, therefore, why the House should recede from its position and revoke the judgment which it has twice rendered upon this question.

Mr. WELLS. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Appropriations when reporting this bill at the present session recommended the repeal of the law creating this commission; and the yeas and nays being called upon the proposition in the House, the committee was sustained and the repealing provision remained in the bill as reported by the committee. From the experience which has been had in this matter, and from conversations with the gentlemen controlling the Indian Department, the committee are of the opinion that these commissioners are no longer necessary to conduct any duties appertaining to that Department.

Mr. HAWLEY. Does the Interior Department recommend the abolition of this commission?

Mr. WELLS. No, sir; I was speaking of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and those in charge of that bureau. At the time this peace commission was created, some twelve years ago, it was a great benefit to the Department.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to hear the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CONGER. I am sitting here listening as well as I can, but am entirely unable to hear the gentleman's remarks.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order; gentlemen on the floor will cease conversation.

Mr. WELLS. The system which has been adopted in late years of appointing by direct action of the Department inspectors for the different classes of goods furnished to the Indian Bureau, such as medicines, dry goods, hardware, groceries, &c., dispenses with any necessity for these commissioners. All that is done by this commission of ten gentlemen, I understand, is simply to sit by and see the bonds opened, a duty which could be performed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or the Secretary of the Interior without this expense of some ten thousand dollars a year. It appears by a communication to the House from the secretary of this board that we are paying for the salary of the secretary $3,000 a year, for one clerk $2,500, and for another clerk $2,400. In my opinion, and in the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations, it is no longer necessary to continue expenses of this kind. I hope the House will not recede from its former action, but will insist upon repealing this unnecessary provision of law.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will concur with the Senate in retaining the Indian commission. The argument of my friend from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] is that the commission appears to be no longer necessary; and this argument seems to be based principally upon the fact that the work of purchasing supplies for the Indians is now very well and very honestly done. Everybody knows, I think—it is my impression, at any rate, and I suppose the impression to be general—that there has been a vast improvement in the management of these Indian matters within ten years, especially in the matter of purchases for the Indians—the purchase of honest goods according to standard and their distribution. Now, because we have arrived at a place in the management of this business when the work is well done, we are told there is no longer any necessity for the methods by which we have arrived at that stage. Gentlemen tell us if we dispense with this commission we are gradually to return toward that state of affairs when these purchases were notoriously dishonest and their distribution notoriously unfair.

Now, these gentlemen have served, as is well known, without payment except the bare expense. I know some of them and I know they are capable and honest gentlemen, who take pride in the country continuing its faith in this matter. The sole expenditure in connection with it is the payment of two or three clerks, the whole amounting to $5,000, or $6,000, or $7,000, or something to that effect; but I do not care if it were $10,000 or $15,000, if it were necessary to carry out this work. I believe, sir, the Government has been a vast gainer, not alone in the matter of economy, but in a matter of equal if not greater importance of keeping faith with the Indians, and it is due to satisfy them, and it is due to our good name and our honest administration we shall continue in use this means which has been of so much benefit and so much credit to us.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say just one word on this question. The Committee on Appropriations in regard to this matter has followed the suggestion which has been made by the Committee on Indian Affairs at this session and at the last session, and during the Forty-fifth and, I believe, the Forth-fourth Congress. This subject has been investigated, and it is clearly the opinion of the Committee on Indian Affairs, as it was the opinion of the Committee on Appropriations, that this commission was no longer necessary for the government of the Indians.

In addition to the amount which is required to defray the expenditures of this commission, which is $10,000, there is also a considerable amount necessary for clerical force, all of which is believed to be entirely unnecessary by the Committee on Appropriations and by the Committee on Indian Affairs. Now it seems to me, in deference to the views of these two committees which have investigated this question, this House ought not to recede from the deliberate position it has taken two or three times on this question. I trust, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the House will further insist on striking out this commission.

Mr. VALENTINE. Mr. Speaker, if the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan prevails, the law remains in force as it is now relative to this peace commission, does it not? I want to understand that before I proceed.

The SPEAKER. It is not for the Chair to answer that question; but it will answer this much, which seems to be the wish of the gentleman, as to the effect of the present vote: The effect of receding from the disagreement on the part of the House will be to pass the bill without further conference. There are only two disagreements, and if the motion of the gentleman from Michigan prevails, that will remove all disagreement and allow the bill to go to the President for his approval or disapproval.

Mr. VALENTINE. Leaving the law as it is?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that, as it is not in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. VALENTINE. I agree, then, Mr. Speaker, with the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Indian Affairs that this motion is unnecessary. If, however, we admit that it is necessary, as the gentleman from Connecticut and the gentleman from Michigan have argued, and the Government by reason of its services has saved money to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars and at the same time preserved peace upon the frontier, then I say let us go a little further and pay these philanthropic gentlemen a salary, and then demand of them that attention to this subject due to its great importance. By reference to section 2042 of the Revised Statutes you will notice they have the supervision over all the accounts of the Indian Department. I find from practical experience among my own constituents who are contractors with the Indian Department that after these contractors have furnished supplies to the Indian Department their accounts go to the Indian Bureau. They are then sent to this commission of eminent citizens for supervision. They are tied up there many months at a time, and these contractors are prevented from getting their money simply from the fact that these eminent gentlemen meet at their own pleasure. There is no authority to require them to meet at specified times. They do not receive pay, and they come when they please and they go when they please. Now, if they are so valuable to the Government, then let us change the law by providing a salary for them and make them meet when they are required to pass on these matters over which they have supervision. If that cannot be done, then I shall vote to sustain the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee of conference, perhaps I ought to say a word or two in reference to the pending question. This peace commission, as gentlemen are aware, was created many years ago, and gentlemen of high character were appointed to discharge the duties of supervision imposed by the law. We are told they are necessary to overlook the Indian agents. Overseers, as we used to call them in the South, men appointed to overlook the interests of their employers. These Indian agents were appointed for a specific purpose. The Indian commission looks after them.

Now, if the allegations be true in regard to these agents, and if it be necessary to have a commission specially to watch them, I hold, and believe it will be found to be equally true, that the same principle will apply to all other men who may abuse their trusts. Let us carry it out to its legitimate consequences: If it be true that it is necessary to have a set of commissioners to watch over these Indian agents, if we carry out the same argument to its logical results in other branches of the Government it would be necessary to have somebody to watch every other officer of the Government.

We paid originally $25,000 for the expenses of this commission. It was then reduced to $15,000. At the last session of Congress the Committee on Appropriations placed in the sundry civil bill a clause providing that $7,000 should be appropriated for this purpose. When it came into the House, after a lengthy discussion, which was participated in by all sides of the House, $7,000 was stricken out, and the House declined then and there by its action to allow anything further for this purpose. The bill in that form went to the Senate, and this provision, although not restored upon that particular bill, was entered upon another, and a provision of $10,000 was incorporated for the expenses of this commission. It came here in that form and passed the House, and went through, I believe, without very much opposition.

Again, a few days ago this point was discussed here, and after considerable discussion on all sides of the House, this same provision was stricken out and your committee on conference has expressed the opinion of the House at the present and last session by refusing to acquiesce in the amendment sought to be incorporated by the Senate. The question now presented for us is simply this: Whether we shall continue to march up the hill to-day and down to-morrow. Is it not time to say halt somewhere in this fluctuating course?

Do we know our own minds? Do we know what is right? Or are we to be overawed and submit without question to the demands of the Senate?

I hope, sir; the House will show its determination by sustaining the report of the committee on conference.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the House for a few moments in reference to this matter. It is admitted by gentlemen on the committee that at the time this commission was appointed the management of Indian affairs was in a very bad condition. They also admit since the commission has been created this management has reached such a stage of perfection as that we may now be able to do entirely without the services of this commission. That is their argument. That is the march up the hill and down again to which the gentleman from Mississippi refers. We started in with this commission when there was not an Indian upon any part of the continent that had any shadow of faith in the integrity, in the honesty, or in the faithful performance of the promises or even in the justice of the United States Government. They had been defrauded by agents. They had been defrauded by traders. There was no kind of goods furnished them by treaty that did not fall below the standard of the requirements of purchase and contracts.

These men constituting the commission, chosen, as far as recommendations could go, from the very best men in the country, devoted their time all along to an attempt to restore between the Indians and the Government some sort of confidence, and on the part of the Indians a belief in the integrity and good faith of the Government toward them. Their efforts were mainly directed to restoring some sort of confidence on the part of the Indians in the correctness of the purchases, and also a verification of the quality of the goods furnished, and to afford relief to the complaints which had been only too justly made that the goods actually purchased in the East never came to the Indians for honest distribution. I have no time to go into the proof, but if I had I could show to this House that the change of goods in transitu from the kind of goods that were purchased under the contract to the kind of goods that were actually delivered to the Indians was in most cases, at least in many cases, of an entirely different class and inferior in quality from the goods which were purchased and which should have been delivered under the contracts.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONGER. When I get through I will answer the gentleman's question. It is within my own knowledge that several of these commissioners have not only performed that duty by examining the purchases which have been made, but they have actually gone at their own expense to many of the different tribes when the goods were being delivered, and were present at the opening of the purchases with specimens or samples of the original purchase in order that they might see for themselves, compare the quality and verify the allegations as to whether the goods had or had not been changed while in transit. They did find that goods had been changed in transitu and inferior goods delivered. They exposed it, and this character of fraud was absolutely stopped by the developments made in this way. And now, as gentlemen admit, there comes to the Indian tribes not only the goods purchased, but of proper quality and with amount unchanged. In other words, the goods now furnished to the Indians are absolutely such as the law and the contract requires.

One gentleman of the commission, as high-minded and honorable a man as walks upon the footstool, served for years without pay upon that commission; and at his own expense went to almost every Indian tribe in the United States and examined their condition and reported upon it. I refer to that distinguished gentleman, now the governor of my own State, Hon. David H. Jerome. He went to Washington Territory, and Oregon, and California, to Idaho, to Arizona, to every one of the Territories where these Indian tribes were located. He went among the Utes and among all of the Indian tribes, and everywhere in the Territories where there were large bands of Indians, examined their condition, examined and compared the quality of the goods which were furnished to them, and did more, in my judgment, by his personal investigation and examination, and his personal knowledge thus derived of the condition of the Indians, and in restoring confidence in the Government, in bringing them subject to treaties and the enforcement of treaty regulations, than every one of these men in the Indian Bureau at home.

Sir, there needs to be watching over these Indian traders and contractors. I do not blame the gentleman from Nebraska for opposing this, for his constituents are traders, his constituents are contractors. He says he appears on behalf of these traders, these contractors, and desires us to wait a little to see whether the goods they furnish are acceptable and their contracts are fair.

Oh, sir, if we had begun years ago to have these contracts examined, there would not have been to-day that infamous stain on the good faith of the United States in the dealings with the Indians that there is now. The Indian management to-day is respectable. It is not a disgrace to-day to be a contractor for Indian supplies. It is not a disgrace to a man to-day in itself to be an Indian agent. It is not a disgrace to-day to be Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The papers which used to hurl shafts of distrust and attack in other days are silent now about the management of Indian Affairs. Why? Because of this commission; because of its watchfulness; because of its integrity; because of its honesty.

Sir, at the paltry expense of $10,000 a year the people of the United States and the Government of the United States have redeemed themselves from the eternal ignominy of mismanagement and treachery and fraud to our Indian wards. The advantage would be cheaply bought if it was $500,000 a year. If we could keep the position we now take of fair dealing and of honesty as a Government toward the Indians, no expense imaginable would be too great. To-day the Indians trust us. To-day the Indians believe in the Government. To-day they receive their goods as the treaties require they shall. Remove this guard and this watch upon them and you open the door for all the frauds, for all the long panorama of iniquities which have disgraced the country in the years that are gone.

The gentleman from Mississippi says the House has voted for this proposition. I refer him to the record, and I say only a trifle more than one-third of this House voted as the gentleman says. A small majority of a quorum was all that gave their vote; and that, too, when this subject had not come up in a way to be examined and understood and when the wish of the Senate had not been expressed. Shall that small vote determine us not to keep in existence at so paltry an expense a commission which has done so much to redeem the honor and the credit and preserve the good faith of the United States in its dealings with the Indians? I will not enlarge upon this matter. The duty of this House is to restore that provision. There is not in all this land a Christian community that does not demand fair dealings with the Indians. By our policy we have placed the choice and the selection of our Indian traders in the hands of the different religious denominations of this country. That, too, has tended to the improvement of our dealings with the Indians.

Mr. VALENTINE. The gentleman means to say Indian agents.

Mr. CONGER. My friend from Nebraska did well to correct me. I should have said Indian agents. Unfortunately there has as yet been found no means whatever to throw Christian influences around Indian traders.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman now yield to me for a question?

Mr. CONGER. I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman from Michigan has stated before the House that of his own knowledge these frauds were being perpetrated.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, no; I did not state that.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. State what you did say.

Mr. CONGER. I stated from my own knowledge that several of these Indian commissioners had paid their own traveling expenses; and I cited one instance, that of the present governor of my State, who had traveled all over different portions of the United States to see what the condition of the Indians was, and to see if the goods delivered to them were by sample the same as had been purchased.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman has not got my point. The gentleman acknowledges the fact that there were gross frauds perpetrated years ago, and he now——

Mr. CONGER. I have heard of that by the hearing of the ear. The man must be eternally deaf that has never heard of that.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Now I want to ask the gentleman this question: How is it he has been so quiet on the subject so many years and allowed these men to remain in office supervising and overseeing this work of distribution?

Mr. CONGER. Because the gentleman sprang the previous question on me and forbade me to talk on that subject when the bill came up.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman from Michigan, so far as I am aware, never moved an inquiry into the conduct of Indian affairs.

Mr. WELLS. I now move the previous question.

Mr. SCALES. If the gentleman will yield to me I will take the floor and will renew the demand for the previous question before I take my seat.

Mr. WELLS. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina on that assurance.

Mr. SCALES. I am sorry that it seems this question is never to have an end in this House. A year ago the question was before us, and this House by a majority not only decided that this commission was unnecessary at present to the conduct of Indian affairs, but they decided that it was absolutely useless. The bill went to the Senate. There was a conference upon it. The conference committee struck out every dollar of expense and maintained the mere form. And one would have thought from hearing the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] this morning that that would have been sufficient. There are so many of these gentlemen who are anxious to work at their own expense that one would have thought that after that argument in conference was reached these gentlemen and their friends would have been satisfied; they would have maintained the dignity, and they would have done it at their own expense. But, sir, what do we see next? Another bill; a bill foreign to the question, a bill on which the House had no right to expect it, was cumbered in the Senate with that question again. It was brought back to this House, and it passed this House without the knowledge of a single member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I might say without the knowledge of a large majority of this House.

At this session we have been repeating what we did last year. Why? I ask gentlemen to hear me for a short time on that point. Why have the Committee on Indian Affairs insisted upon the position it has taken on this subject? Why does the House adhere to it? Why have the Committee on Appropriations come up to our help and insisted that this position should be maintained? It is for the reasons and those alone which I will now proceed to give.

Will any gentleman deny, can any gentleman deny, that there are now officers enough connected with the Indian Department to perform this whole duty? There is no gentleman here who knows anything about the matter who will dare deny that there is in that Department an officer for every service required, and if he does his duty, all that need be done can be well and properly done. You have already your inspectors. It is said we want the gentlemen of this commission to inspect the goods which are purchased for the Indians. You have officers now for that express purpose, who are each paid an annual salary of $3,000, whose expenses are paid, and who are sent out where the goods are bought and to the agents where they are delivered, to do the very work which gentlemen claim this commission must do.

The commission grew out of the frauds of 1869. In the efforts then made to reform the service, instead of doing what every statesman would have said ought to have been done; instead of seeing to it that competent, faithful, and capable men who would do their duty were appointed as officers in the Department, what was done? A provision was enacted to multiply officers, and this unfortunately has been in the past too much the policy of our Government.

And when you once increase the number of your officers, when you once put into a Department an additional force to be paid by the Government, I care not how earnestly you may strive, you never can strike them down. They are there, and there they will remain. This $10,000 for this commission, for this useless, worthless, unnecessary sinecure, must go on for all time, although you have officers already paid to do the very same work, and officers who have the time to do the work and who are capable of doing it if they will be faithful.

Mr. HOOKER. Will my friend allow me to have read the provision from the law to which I referred in my remarks?

Mr. SCALES. I will do so.

Mr. HOOKER. I ask the Clerk to read that which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And for the purpose of enabling the President to execute the powers conferred by this act he is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to organize a board of commissioners, to consist of not more than ten persons, to be selected by him from men eminent for their intelligence and philanthropy, to serve without pecuniary compensation, who may, under his direction, exercise joint control with the Secretary of the Interior over the disbursement of the appropriations made by this act or any part thereof that the President may designate; and to pay the necessary expenses of transportation, subsistence, and clerk hire of said commissioners while actually engaged in said service there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SCALES. If this commission is continued, I say here in my place to-day that there will be no justification for it, except upon the assumption that your Secretary of the Interior will not do his duty, upon the assumption that your Commissioner of Indian Affairs will commit fraud or allow others to do so, except upon the assumption that the agents which you have appointed throughout the country will commit fraud or allow fraud to be committed. It is upon that assumption alone that this action can be justified; it can be justified in no other way.

If these officers do their duty, there is not a man who now hears me who does not know that all this fraud can be prevented. Suppose the goods are bought and inspected by these commissioners; how do you know that those goods will not be changed in transit? How do you know the same goods will reach the agency? You cannot know; you must depend upon the agent; and he can continue to cheat you now as he has done before. The commission cannot prevent him from doing it, or if they can, you have inspectors to do the very same work which it is proposed you shall employ this commission to do.

I appeal to this House in the hope that the time has come when we will cut down this extraordinary and uncommon expense. It is true it is but a few thousand dollars, only $10,000. It is true these men are honorable gentlemen; I have not a word to say against them. But, although they are honorable gentlemen, that is no reason why Congress should pay honorable gentlemen to do what we now have paid officers with large salaries to do.

Another point which I desire to answer. One gentleman gets up here and says that there have been great reforms since this commission was appointed. Is that so? You have added to your labor; you have covered up some of the work, but in my opinion you have added nothing to the efficiency of the service. And I do not believe you have added anything to its purity; and in saying that I do not intend to say one word against anything they have done.

I have no more to say. I hope this House will stand by what it has done. I hope we will not now undo what we have before done. We yielded partially to the Senate a year ago, and then the Senate afterward put a provision on another appropriation bill which ought not to have been there. I hope this House will stand by what it has done. I hope we will adhere to our position and not undo that which we have heretofore agreed upon.

Mr. WELLS. I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] calls the previous question on the series of motions presented.

The previous question was ordered; there being—ayes 88, noes 28.

Mr. WELLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The vote will now be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. HAYES. Will the Chair state that motion?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan is that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same, the effect of which would be to pass the bill with the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. We may as well have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 124, not voting 62; as follows:

So the motion of Mr. CONGER was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. SCALES said: Mr. Speaker, I think this question is not understood. A vote in the negative on this question is, I believe, a vote against continuing the commission.

The SPEAKER. An affirmative vote would have the effect of terminating the further disagreement with the Senate. That body, the Chair will take the liberty of stating, has insisted on the continuation of the commission.

Mr. SCALES. Those who vote "no," vote to discontinue the commission.

When the roll-call was concluded, the following pairs were announced:

Mr. TUCKER with Mr. FRYE, both gentlemen being absent by order of the House.

Mr. OVERTON with Mr. ROSS, until further notice.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. RUSSELL of Massachusetts.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS with Mr. EWING.

Mr. PAGE with Mr. HENRY.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. JOYCE.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. KELLEY with Mr. MCKENZIE.

Mr. REAGAN with Mr. HARRIS of Massachusetts.

Mr. HOUSE with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. BOYD. I wish to state that my colleague, Mr. HENDERSON, is absent from the House on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. WELLS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The questions now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the further conference asked by that body.

Mr. CONGER. Would it be in order to couple with this a motion for instructions to the committee of conference?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think this is in the nature of an instruction. It merely reasserts the former judgment of the House.

Mr. CONGER. But I ask whether it would be in order to insist with instructions?

The SPEAKER. The motion to insist is recognized by the rules, and the other part of the motion becomes necessary because the Senate has asked for a further conference. The Chair does not think this action is in the nature literally of an instruction. There might be some controversy as to the power of the House to instruct; but the Chair does not think that question is now presented.

Mr. CONGER. As I understand we are instructing the conference committee by insisting.

The SPEAKER. The motion to insist is the only way in which the bill could get to a conference, so that an agreement might be reached between the two Houses. It is a motion known to the rules.

Mr. CONGER. Then I understand that the former conference committee has exhausted itself, and a new one must now be appointed?

The SPEAKER. Technically a new one; but it does not follow that it must be composed of different individuals. In fact the committee as named by the Senate for the further conference embraces the same Senators previously appointed.

Mr. CONGER. But technically it is a new conference.

The SPEAKER. Yes, technically it is a new conference. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] that the House insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the further conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. WELLS's motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as the managers of said conference on the part of the House Mr. WELLS, Mr. SINGLETON of Mississippi, and Mr. HUBBELL.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also appoints as managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, Mr. HUBBELL, Mr. FORNEY, and Mr. MCMAHON. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] a member of the sub-committee, is also a member of two other committees, and stating he had not time to serve on this committee, he was excused and Mr. MCMAHON appointed in his place.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, that I was not able to be present at the time the vote was taken by yeas and nays on the subject of disagreement between the two Houses on the Indian appropriation bill. The question was to recede from the disagreement of the House to the amendment of the Senate in reference to the peace commission. I wish to state now that if I had been present I should have voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's statement goes into the RECORD, and he has accomplished his purpose of placing on record the way in which he would vote.

SAMUEL B. HUTCHINSON.

Mr. KLOTZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask, by unanimous consent, to take from the Speaker's table a bill (H. R. No. 3100) granting relief to Samuel B. Hutchinson, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment. If the bill be taken up I shall move to concur in the Senate amendments, so that the bill may pass and go at once to the President.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to give notice that to-morrow morning he will ask to take from the Speaker's table a number of pension bills, which originated in the House and have been returned from the Senate with mere verbal amendments. It seems a pity to have such bills fail when they have passed both Houses, and only lack consideration of, and action on, mere verbal amendments from the Senate. The gentlemen who are interested in such pension cases will take notice and be on hand early.

Mr. DUNN. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. KLOTZ. Does the gentleman object to my bill?

Mr. DUNN. I demand the regular order of business.

DEATH OF FONTAINE W. MAHOOD.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of announcing the death of Mr. F. W. Mahood, late stationery clerk of the House. Many of the members on this floor will bear testimony to the faithful performance of duty by Mr. Mahood during the six years he occupied that position. After a lingering illness of a number of months, which illustrated his energy and his fortitude, he died in Washington yesterday morning at half past two o'clock. Without detaining the House to make any comment whatever on his high character or the eminent merit which every member on this floor who knew him either in his personal or official capacity will acknowledge, I offer the following resolution, which, I understand from the precedents, is usual, and I hope, as others heretofore have passed the House, this also will pass unanimously:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the expenses of the last illness and funeral of Fontaine W. Mahood, late stationery clerk of the House of Representatives, to an amount not exceeding $500; and he is hereby further authorized and directed to pay to the widow of the said Mahood a sum equal to his pay as stationery clerk as aforesaid for one year; and all payments herein authorized and directed shall be made out of the contingent fund of the House, subject to the approval of the Committee on Accounts.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been demanded and this being the third Monday of the month, motions for a suspension of the rules are now in order where such suspensions are directed to be moved by committees of the House. The call of committees for such motions rests with the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CHOCTAW CLAIM.

Mr. HOOKER. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to move that the rules be suspended and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 440) for the ascertainment of the amount due the Choctaw Nation, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, and that the amendment be agreed to and the bill passed. This is the unanimous action of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I shall ask first for the reading of the bill and amendment and then for the reading of the brief accompanying report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Court of Claims is hereby authorized to take jurisdiction of and try all questions of difference arising out of treaty stipulations with the Choctaw Nation, and to render judgment thereon; and the Attorney-General is hereby directed to appear in behalf of the Government, and if said court shall decide against the United States, the Attorney-General shall, within thirty days from the rendition of judgment, appeal the cause to the Supreme Court of the United States; and from any judgment that may be rendered the said Choctaw Nation may also appeal to said Supreme Court: Provided, The appeal of said Choctaw Nation shall be taken within sixty days after the rendition of said judgment; and the said courts shall give such cause precedence.

SEC. 2. Said action shall be commenced by a petition stating the facts on which said nation claims to recover and the amount of its claim; and said petition may be verified by either of the authorized delegates of said nation as to the existence of such facts, and no other statements need be contained in said petition or verification.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In the first section, after the words "judgment thereon," insert these words:

"Power is hereby granted the said court to review the entire question of differences de novo, and it shall not be estopped by any action had or award made by the Senate of the United States in pursuance of the treaty of 1855."

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no demand for a second. Is debate desired, and if so for what time?

Mr. HOOKER. Under the rules fifteen minutes is allowed on each side.

The SPEAKER. Under the practice heretofore adopted at the suggestion of the Chair the friends of the proposition in reference to which suspension is moved will occupy ten minutes, and then fifteen minutes are given to those opposed to it, leaving the last five minutes to those in favor of the measure.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I will in a few minutes say all I desire to say to the House on this subject. It is known to most of the members of the House who have been here for some sessions of Congress that this matter has been pending for a great number of years. The liability on the part of the Government was created by the treaty of 1855, by which the Senate of the United States was constituted an umpire to determine by arbitration whether anything was due to the Choctaw people, and, if so, how much. They decided on the 9th of March, 1859, as the accompanying report demonstrates, by resolution allowing the net proceeds of the lands of these Indians east of the Mississippi, which they had ceded in 1830, and requiring the Secretary of the Interior to report to Congress the amount due under the prescribed principles of settlement. The arbitration made by the Senate determined what that principle should be. It was decided that the Choctaw Nation was entitled to $1.25 for the lands which had been sold prior to January of a certain year, and twelve and one-half cents an acre for lands sold afterward. This was the award of the Senate in 1859. It remains as yet undisposed of. It remains unpaid with the exception of $500,000 which was paid at one time. There have been thirteen reports made in favor of this claim, all showing a large amount due. Old Colonel Pitchlyn, for twenty-five or thirty years served here as the representative of his people and the delegate of his nation with a view to have this matter adjusted and settled on an equitable basis for the Indians.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question? I would like to know how much this bill proposes to appropriate?

Mr. HOOKER. Simply whatever the Court of Claims shall give. This bill proposes to refer the whole matter to the Court of Claims to ascertain whether anything whatever is due to the Indians, and if anything is due what amount. It is even proposed to allow the Court of Claims to go behind the arbitration already awarded by the Senate in favor of these Indians.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is any sum appropriated by this bill whatever; and if not, is not the design or object of it that Congress may hereafter make an appropriation to cover whatever sum may be adjudicated as due by the Court of Claims?

Mr. HOOKER. That is the sole object of the bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to ask what has been the cause of delay in regard to this matter, and why it has not been acted upon before?

Mr. HOOKER. The reason is because they could never get it up for consideration or have it attached to an appropriation bill. They never could get action upon it by the House. Now, the Committee on Indian Affairs, anxious to dispose of the question and rid itself and the Legislature of the Government from any further trouble in reference to this matter, proposes again to refer it to a court of the United States—the Court of Claims—to ascertain and report the entire matter in dispute as to whether anything is due, and if anything is due, what amount.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question. Whether the object of this bill is to abandon the arbitration already made by the Senate in favor of these Indians; in other words, to go behind that arbitration and open up the whole question?

Mr. HOOKER. That is the intent of the bill. It passes behind the question of arbitration and opens up the whole subject so that the Court of Claims may investigate it thoroughly.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the merits of this bill. Many years ago I examined most carefully the provisions of bills introduced in regard to this claim. As has been stated there has never failed to be a favorable report from some twelve or fifteen committees who have examined the subject. Each one of these committees reported that the Choctaw Nation was entitled to payment for this land. Old Chief Pitchlyn has been here ever since I have been a member of Congress mildly and equitably urging the claim of his people before Congress and before the committee; and all the committees of the House and Senate have reported favorably upon it.

At one time the House did act favorably upon this matter, but it was not reached in the Senate. At another time I think the Senate passed favorably upon the bill but it failed to be acted upon in that Congress by the House. As a last resort this bill provides that the arbitration of the Senate and all of its provisions be repealed, and that the Court of Claims should have power to investigate the whole question, and if they find that there is anything due under this treaty with the Choctaw Nation, they shall declare and certify it to Congress. The Government under the provision of this bill is fully protected. If the judgment of the Court of Claims be, according to the opinion of the law officers, erroneous in any respect, provision is made for taking the whole question to the Supreme Court of the United States. I most sincerely hope that after a thorough examination of all the provisions of the bill it may pass the House at this time.

Mr. HOOKER. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to attempt, in the short time allowed me, to discuss the merits of this Choctaw claim, and in fact it is not necessary in the consideration of this bill for this House to come to any conclusion whatever as to whether or not the Government of the United States is indebted to this tribe of Indians, because that is the very question which the bill proposes to submit to the judicial determination of the Court of Claims and the Supreme Court. In 1855 a treaty was negotiated with this tribe of Indians, which was not ratified, however, until March, 1856. This treaty provided that all questions at issue between the Government and the Indians as to the existence of their claims on account of lands sold by the Government should be submitted to the arbitration of the United States Senate, a tribunal in which one of the parties to the controversy had no representation and no voice whatever. In 1859 the Senate, after its committee had made a thorough investigation of the subject, determined that these Indians should have the net proceeds of the sale of lands after deducting the expenses to which the Government had been subjected in making the sales, and directed the Secretary of the Interior to make an account and report the amount received from the sales and the amount of money expended in effecting them. That report was made in accordance with the law, and in 1861 the Senate, by a vote of 29 to 15, nearly two to one, passed a bill to pay these Indians the sum of $1,202,000 as an "undisputed balance" due them, and so stated on the face of the bill.

That bill came to this House and was not agreed to; but instead of it a bill was passed directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the Indians the sum of $500,000 "on account" of their claims against the Government, $250,000 to be paid in cash and $250,000 in bonds. The cash payment was made, but the amount of $250,00 in bonds provided for in that statute has never to this date been delivered to those Indians.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is that the foundation for the claim that they have been paid in full?

Mr. CARLISLE. It is not. There is no claim, so far as I know, that these Indians have been paid in full, except an assertion which was made by one of the Solicitors of the Treasury by the name of Banfield, a few years ago, in which he went back to a receipt given to the Government by this tribe of Indians in November, 1852, three years before the treaty was made and seven years before the award which it is now proposed to submit to the adjudication of the court.

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes of the time allotted to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] have expired.

Mr. CARLISLE. I wish only one minute more.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will let me explain that point.

Mr. CARLISLE. Now, as I have said, gentlemen may entertain different views as to the amount which is due to these Indians; and some even may suppose there is nothing whatever due them. But I think I can affirm, without impeachment of the capacity of the individual members of this House, that no tribunal less qualified to adjudicate upon such a claim than this House can be found anywhere. If this had been an award in favor of a foreign government it would have been paid twenty years ago. If any gentleman will contrast the action of the Government of the United States with reference to the Halifax fishery award and other awards adjudicating claims between this Government and foreign nations with its action in reference to this award, made in behalf of a poor and friendless tribe of Indians, he will see the vast difference between the treatment accorded to the one and the treatment accorded to the others. It is a disgrace and a shame, in my judgment, to this great nation that it will not give to this tribe of Indians at least the poor privilege of bringing a suit against it in its own courts, with the express provision that the Attorney-General shall take the case to the Supreme Court of the United States in case the judgment shall be against the Government.

Mr. HOOKER. How much of my time is exhausted?

The SPEAKER. Eleven minutes. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is recognized in opposition to the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BLOUNT. This is a very old claim. It was fully discussed before the war; and so far from its being regarded then, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] regards it now, as an outrage upon a poor tribe of Indians, the debates disclosed that some of the ablest men of this country looked upon it as a deliberate attempt to enforce a fraudulent claim against this Government.

The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER,] a few moments ago, in answer to a question by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STEVENSON] why this matter had not been disposed of before, said it was because there had never been an opportunity to put it on an appropriation bill; there never was an opportunity to have it discussed before the House of Representatives. I remember quite well in the Forty-third Congress, when the Committee on Indian Affairs reported this question, a Representative at that time from the State of Missouri, Mr. Comingo, argued it at length for the space of one hour, and it was discussed here for many hours deliberately, and the proposition was deliberately voted down by this House. The impression made at that time by the debate upon the House was that the claim was wrong and ought not to be paid.

The claim was again before the House in the Forty-fourth Congress and was discussed. It has had repeated discussions upon this floor and it has never had a successful issue upon those discussions.

Mr. HOOKER. If the gentleman from Georgia will permit me I will say the only discussion this bill has ever had was one night in the last session of Congress——

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not yield.

Mr. HOOKER. This is always said to be an old soldier. It grows older every time you postpone it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir. It grows older every time you postpone it. That is true; but it seems to grow stronger, because while the testimony of the Government grows weaker the facilities for strengthening the testimony against the Government are generally found to be much greater.

Now, sir, what is the proposition? Here is an old claim a quarter of a century old that is to have the pre-eminence over the vast number of claims upon that Calendar, and that shall go to the Court of Claims with all the disadvantages of age against the Government, shall go to the Court of Claims when the policy of the Government has been against it, when you are denying that privilege to thousands of claimants, when you do not know what is the extent of the sum that may be involved in it and which will have perhaps a great deal to do with the amount of effort made for the success of the litigation.

The gentleman from Mississippi has well said that he cannot tell what it may amount to. Then why is it that such pre-eminence is given to this claim, that it shall go to the Court of Claims, while that privilege is denied to others?

Mr. HOOKER. If the gentleman will look to the report——

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not yield.

Mr. HOOKER. You do not want information.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not want to yield to the gentleman. I do not think this House ought to yield to the gentleman now. We cannot say what sum is involved in this old claim, as I have said a quarter of a century old.

Mr. HOOKER. The report shows it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Much of the testimony on behalf of the Government may have disappeared, and it is an utter impossibility in the time allowed here without notice to gather up the facts that legitimately belong to this debate, and the reasons which have induced Congress for many long years to refuse to entertain the idea of appropriating money for the payment of this claim or the idea of submitting it to the courts.

I have said this much, because it is impossible for me to go into the merits of this question, and I shall not undertake to do so. I trust that this old claim that has been argued and discussed here for years shall not, under a suspension of the rules, be given pre-eminence over the vast number of other claims against the Government which are upon our Calendars.

Mr. SPARKS. I desire to say a few words on this subject. I had something to do with this old moss-backed claim as a former member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and recollect that in a document which I have sent for the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Boutwell—I am now speaking from memory—substantially reported that this claim and every dollar due upon it had been paid and receipted for. And if I remember aright, a copy of the receipt is given in that report.

My friend from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is a little wrong in stating the age of this claim as being a quarter of a century. I think it is a little over thirty years old, perhaps a third of a century. I know it has been here ever since I have been in Congress. It was defeated in the Forty-fourth Congress. We had it up for consideration at a night session less than a month ago, when we had all the documents before us, and it was then thoroughly discussed. It was then defeated, or passed over——

A MEMBER. The point was raised of there being no quorum present which broke up the session.

Mr. SPARKS. Something was done with it; at all events it did not get through. Now I rely largely in this discussion upon the report of the Secretary of the Treasury made a number of years ago. The report referred to has now reached me from the document-room. It is Executive Document No. 69, to the third session of the Forty-Second Congress. Perhaps the best argument I can make would be to read from this report. Mr. Boutwell says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Office of the Secretary, January 6, 1873.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a report made by the Solicitor of the Treasury upon the claim against the Government known as the Choctaw claim. In this report the origin, nature, and history of the claim are fully presented. The Solicitor finds that the claim has not only been paid, but that it is barred by a receipt or acknowledgment of full satisfaction, given by the authorities of the Choctaw Nation in the year 1852. A photographic copy of the paper referred to is also transmitted.

After such an examination as I have been able to give to the subject, I concur in the conclusion reached by the Solicitor.

* * * * * * *

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL,
Secretary.

To JAMES G. BLAINE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CARLISLE. That was before this treaty was made.

Mr. SPARKS. That was twenty-nine years ago. Subsequently the matter was reopened by some legerdemain process, and a treaty, or something of that kind, was gotten up by which the claim was still kept alive, and upon which the present proceedings are based.

Mr. HOOKER. The treaty was made in 1855.

Mr. SPARKS. There will be no controversy between gentlemen and myself on this point if they will but hear me. A treaty prior to that time (1852) had been made, and in relation to which this report of the Secretary of the Treasury was submitted. Subsequently, (namely, in 1855,) the claim was revived and a new treaty, or something of that kind, was made by which the matter was to be submitted to the Senate, &c.

Mr. HOOKER. The treaty of 1855 was the treaty under which, by the eleventh article of that treaty, this question was submitted to the award of the Senate.

Mr. SPARKS. I shall not object, but will not be diverted from the main point at issue by these interruptions. The Secretary of the Treasury has stated that the claim has not only been paid, but that it is barred by a receipt or acknowledgment of full satisfaction given by the authorities of the Choctaw Nation in the year 1852, and I will now read that receipt or acknowledgment of payment.

Whereas by an act of Congress entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852," it is provided that after the 30th day of June, 1852, all payments of interest on the amounts awarded Choctaw claimants, under the fourteenth article of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, for lands on which they resided, but which it is impossible to give them, shall cease; and that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to pay said claimants the amount of principal awarded in each case respectively, and that amount necessary for this purpose be appropriated, not exceeding $872,000; and that the final payment and satisfaction of said awards shall be first ratified and approved as a final release of all claims of such parties under the fourteenth article of said treaty, by the proper national authority of the Choctaws, in such form as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Now, be it known that the said general council of the Choctaw Nation do hereby ratify and approve the final payment and satisfaction of said awards, agreeably to the provisions of the act aforesaid, as a final release of all claims of such parties under the fourteenth article of said treaty.

A. NAIL, Speaker.

November 6, 1852.

Passed in the Senate.

D. McCOY, President.

Approved.

GEORGE W. HARKINS.
GEORGE FOLSOM.

Mr. HOOKER. What is the date of that report?

Mr. SPARKS. The report is dated January 6, 1873. But the receipt, as will be seen, was given November 6, 1852.

Mr. HOOKER. The receipt referred to in that report was before the treaty submitting the matter to the award of the Senate.

Mr. SPARKS. Precisely so; and it shows how necessary it is to kick out of Congress these old defunct claims, for in this case, notwithstanding, as the Secretary of the Treasury (who thoroughly examined into it) states, this claim had been paid, and that there was a receipt or acknowledgment distinctly showing that fact; yet by some trickery it was afterward revived and again presented to Congress, where it has from thence hitherto been urged by an adroit lobby for repayment. And now, after all this, we are asked by this bill to still further vitalize and submit this once paid and antiquated claim to the Court of Claims for adjudication, nearly a third of a century subsequent to its original adjustment and payment, as certified to by the highest official of the Treasury Department.

I do not care anything about a bogus treaty or arrangement gotten up since 1852. It is plain that it was adjusted and paid in 1852; and if you go on now and submit this "old stager" to the Court of Claims, however fraudulent it may be, it is by no means certain that the Government may not have to pay two or three million dollars in the end; there is no telling how much. It is notoriously a fraud, and we ought at once to sit down on it.

Mr. FORT. I suppose I have had as much or more correspondence in reference to this claim with the chiefs of the Choctaw Nation than perhaps any other gentleman on this floor. I hold here in my hand several long communications covering nearly a hundred pages of foolscap from the Coleman Cole Choctaw chiefs in reference to this claim, and from other Indians of that nation. I have also letters from P. Pitchlyn and several others, and have had many personal conferences with them.

It originated under the treaty of 1830, and indeed relates back to the treaty of 1820, a long time ago; and has been pending in one form or another ever since 1856, but was never presented till about 1855. It is impossible to go over the whole history of this case now. It would take several hours to do so. Ever since I have been in this House this claim has been here, and I have deemed it to be my duty to oppose it whenever it came up.

It is now presented in another and less objectional shape; and perhaps it may be well to pass this bill if it is properly guarded. This matter should be ended in some way. If the Attorney-General is vigilant and collects all the evidence and presents it to the court there can be no wrong done. The question is whether or not any of this money is due the Choctaws, and if so how much. There is certainly not anything like so large a sum due as is claimed.

The claim is for over two millions of dollars. Congress at one time appropriated $500,000 for the payment of this claim, and it is probable, from what I have ascertained, that Congress was then of the opinion that $500,000 was all that should be paid. I have here long correspondence from Coleman Cole, principal chief of the Choctaw Nation, who is now ex-chief, I believe, in which he shows, as I understand him, that not one single dollar of that $500,000 ever reached the representatives of the Choctaw Nation or any of that people, but it all went into the hands of, and was used up by, the agents who then had control of the claim. It may be, from what I have learned, that these claim agents induced Congress to believe that if they would appropriate $500,000 that would be the end of it, and it is true that receipts in full were given to the United States by the agents of the Choctaw Nation for the whole claim.

This principal chief, and ex-governor of the Choctaw Nation, who has written to me so often, seems to be an honest man, and he frankly states that as the representative of that nation he does not claim that there is so much due under this treaty as the amount reported by the committee's report accompanying this bill. He says that it was not the fault of the United States that the $500,000 appropriated was not paid to the Indians, and he, as I understand, does not claim arrearages of interest. The interest being the principal part of this claim, I believe he makes out that $899,563.90 is all that is now honestly due to the people of the Choctaw Nation, notwithstanding this report claims that over two millions of dollars ought to be paid them. This claim, as I understand, is not pressed by the Choctaws, but is in the hands of a syndicate of claim agents of this city, who have perhaps bought up the claim and now own it, and they are pressing it here. These claim agents used Colonel Peter Pitchlyn, a Choctaw ex-chief, lately deceased, as the authority for their action in urging this claim upon Congress. It is claimed by some of the Choctaws that he had no authority to represent them in the matter of this claim. Whatever of this money may be due is for lands in Mississippi, and is due to individual Indians and not to the Choctaws as a tribe; and it is not likely that there is a single Indian now living who was one of the original claimants for his individual lands fifty years ago. This money belongs to unknown heirs in a great measure, so the bill ought to provide that the money should be paid to the proper parties, if to any persons. The Choctaws admit that the United States was not properly called upon for this money until 1856, and hence claim no interest for any time before that date. And yet these claim agents demand interest under all former bills, and hope to recover interest under this bill for forty-one years. I desire that every honest claim shall be paid; especially should we pay the Indian all we owe him.

I have always strenuously opposed all former bills to pay this claim, because it allowed the whole sum and a vast amount for arrearages of interest, and made no deduction for what had been paid. But, as this bill refers the question to the Court of Claims, it may be best and I presume is best and all right to pass it. I believe there is something due the individual Choctaws. I cannot figure it out, however, to be more than $899,563.90, and it is perhaps not even so much as that.

I wish merely to call attention to these matters; and if this bill passes I desire that the Attorney-General may have the benefit of these references and papers to show that the honest Choctaws themselves do not claim that there is so much money due them as this claim represents.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is it the claim agents who claim this large sum?

Mr. FORT. Yes; the claim agents have received $500,000, and they claim over two millions still, and they will get all of it if we are not careful, and the Indians will get none.

Mr. ROBINSON. They want the rest of it; that is it.

Mr. HOOKER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL.]

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Speaker, as has been justly stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] it is a matter of small importance to this House whether there is $1 due or $1,000,000. This bill does not contemplate the appropriation of a single cent. It simply proposes the lawful adjudication of this claim in the Supreme Court. Are you afraid of the Supreme Court? The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] says there is a receipt on file showing that the claim is settled. If there is, will not the Supreme Court of the United States take cognizance of that receipt? The gentleman also says that we appropriated $500,000 of this money. But we paid only half of that. Will gentlemen deny that the other half of the amount appropriated is due? Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars is due by their own admission, is it not?

Mr. SPARKS. There is a receipt in full.

Mr. HASKELL. Why not be fair about this matter, and pass this bill, giving to the Indian the poor privilege of going into your courts and bringing there all this damaging testimony which you say may be produced? What are you afraid of? For twenty-five years these men have stood here asking you to do something. Are we, representatives of the people, so cowardly that we dare not open our own courts to the inquiry of an Indian?

Mr. HOOKER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, in the Forty-third Congress I investigated this whole question. I read every paper on the subject from the time of the purchase of the Mississippi Territory from the Choctaw Indians under the treaty down to the time of my examination. In the minute now allowed me I wish to speak of the receipt which has been referred to. Under the terms of the treaty the Indians who elected to remain in Mississippi were entitled to six hundred and forty acres of land as their homestead, and the remainder of the land was purchased by the Government. In the settlement of the individual claims this receipt was given; but it had nothing on the face of the earth to do with the original purchase of the great tract of land ceded by the Choctaw Indians to the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOOKER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. STEVENSON.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill. I do not know, nor can it be clearly ascertained from this discussion, what amount is due the Choctaws or whether anything is due them. But this bill simply proposes to allow a friendly tribe of Indians to go into the courts and there establish whatever rights they may have. To refuse to pass this bill would be in violation of treaty stipulation and an act of sheer injustice to a people who cannot be heard upon this floor. For more than twenty years the Choctaws have endeavored to have an adjudication of what they consider an honest claim against the Government for their lands. The pending bill simply proposes to give them a hearing in a court of justice. For the reason, Mr. Speaker, that I am willing to trust the courts, and for the further reason that I am unwilling to do injustice to a people who have so much cause to complain of our treatment in the past, I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Half a minute.

Mr. HOOKER. I yield that to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill for the reason stated by my colleague, [Mr. STEVENSON.] I desire that every private claim before this Congress shall be referred to some competent judicial tribunal, in order that we may ascertain by judicial processes how much the Government owes. The question with me is as to the amount of our obligation under the law. When that has been determined, I am willing to pay it. But I am opposed to the adjudication of any private claim by Congress. I think this bill proposes a proper method of disposing of all private claims.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] to suspend the rules and pass this bill with the amendment recommended by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 175, nays 44, not voting 72; as follows:

NEW ORLEANS AND NORTHEASTERN RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 7223) granting the right of way to the New Orleans and Northeastern Railroad Company through the public lands along its route between New Orleans, Louisiana, and Meridian, Mississippi; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

JUDICIAL SYSTEM OF MONTANA.

Mr. BOUCK. I am directed by the Committee on the Territories to move that the rules be suspended and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1319) to reorganize the judicial system of the Territory of Montana, and be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That hereafter the supreme court of the Territory of Montana shall consist of a chief-justice and three associate justices, two of whom shall constitute a quorum, and they shall hold their offices for four years and until their successors are appointed and qualified. They shall hold a term annually at the seat of government of said Territory; but no judge shall sit at the hearing of any cause in said supreme court which cause was heard or tried before him.

SEC. 2. The said Territory of Montana shall be divided into four judicial districts, and a district court shall be held in each district of the Territory by one of the justices of the supreme court, at such time and place as may be prescribed by law; and each judge, after assignment, shall reside in the district to which he is assigned.

SEC. 3. That an additional associate justice of the supreme court of said Territory of Montana shall be appointed in the manner now provided by law, who, until otherwise assigned as now provided by law, shall hold a district court, at such times and places as may be prescribed by the governor of said Territory, within and for the county of Custer, and such other newly organized counties in said Territory as may be attached thereto for judicial purposes; and said district shall be known and designated as the fourth judicial district of said Territory.

SEC. 4. That the additional associate justice hereby provided for shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and to the same compensation, and shall be subject to all the provisions of law applicable to the present associate justices of the supreme courts of the Territories, except as otherwise herein provided.

The SPEAKER. Is there a second to the motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. WHITE. I understand this increases the number of justices one; I should like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. BOUCK. Let the report be read. It gives all the facts of the case, if gentlemen will only listen to it.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1319) to reorganize the judicial system of the Territory of Montana, report:

That we find that the said Territory is about six hundred miles long and three hundred miles wide.

The western or mountainous portion was first filled with a mining and agricultural population, is divided into three judicial districts, all very large, and having such an amount of business before the courts as can scarcely be disposed of.

The eastern counties of the Territory, more recently organized, and now being more rapidly settled than any other portion, have no judicial facilities, but have been temporarily attached to the older districts.

It was at one time contemplated to create a new Territory out of this portion of Montana and the western part of Dakota, but it was deemed more economical to give an additional judge to Western Dakota, which has been done, and one to Eastern Montana, which this bill proposes.

This would maintain order and administer justice quite as well and save the expense of a new territorial government.

Miles City, the county seat of Custer, and the nearest county town in the eastern counties, is four hundred and thirty-three miles distant from Virginia City, the only point in the judicial district to which these counties are temporarily attached where a United States court can be held.

The fees and mileage of marshals, witnesses, and jurors over this great distance amount to a very large sum; so much so that it is clear that to establish a court for these eastern counties is not only a matter of necessity, but of economy.

The letter of Hon. Henry N. Blake, late judge of the first judicial district, shows that territorial business cannot be transacted under present conditions.

We call attention to the letter of the Attorney-General, and other communications hereto attached, and recommend the passage of the bill:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, WASHINGTON, February 6, 1880.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of a communication from Hon. Henry N. Blake, late associate justice of Montana Territory, relative to the necessity of the appointment of another associate justice for that Territory.

In my opinion the reasons stated are sufficient to render it proper that such an office should be created.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. DEVENS,
Attorney-General.

Hon. MARTIN MAGINNIS, House of Representatives.

VIRGINIA CITY, MONTANA, January 23, 1880.

SIR: I wish to call your attention to the necessity of passing a bill, similar to that pending in Congress, creating another associate justice for this Territory. As my successor has been appointed, I cannot be accused of selfish motives in making the following suggestions. If another justice is provided for he would be assigned to Custer County. A glance at the map of Montana will show more readily than these remarks the extent of this section.

1. Custer County is now in the first judicial district. Its county-seat is Miles City, which is four hundred and thirty-three miles from Virginia City, the residence of the judge. A person must go between these places in stages, which consume from five to ten days and nights in making one trip. During the past year I spent four weeks in traveling upon the road to hold two terms of court. There are four counties in this district, and the supreme court meets twice in each year. The inconvenience of this mode of conveyance over 1,700 miles annually is evident.

2. The population of Custer County will increase rapidly, and litigation must thrive in the same ratio. The Northern Pacific Railroad will cut the east boundary of the Territory during the summer and be completed to the Yellowstone River. Steamboats ascend this stream in the season of navigation above the mouth of the Bighorn. People can thus arrive at any point in this county without difficulty. It is a rich country and must attract thousands of settlers within a brief period. One judge will be unable to attend properly to the business of the district. Summary remedies, such as injunctions, are now of little value. The papers would be about two weeks or more in the mails and might be rendered worthless by this delay. If the judge is in Custer County the other parts of the district are deprived of these remedies. If the judge is in one of the other counties of the district then Custer County suffers to this extent.

3. The business of the United States will be promoted by the proposed change. Under the law, the United States courts must be held in only one place in the district. Virginia City is in the most populous county, and therefore this business is now transacted there. But the chief portion of the United States causes arises in Custer County, on account of its Indian reservations and extensive military posts. The fees allowed witnesses by the Government are far below the actual cost of traveling from Custer County to Virginia, and it is difficult, if not impossible, to procure their attendance. Most of the criminal prosecutions are failures through this reason. The Government cannot transport a witness who is too poor to pay his expenses upon the road, and courts cannot punish a person who is willing but not able to appear before juries. Guilty parties escape for want of proof, which could be obtained if the place of trial was in Custer County. The interests of the United States are injured by this state of affairs. Its property will be rendered more secure if criminals know that conviction will surely follow evil deeds.

4. The terms of court must be held in Custer County in May and September on account of this condition of the roads. At any other time the journey is more difficult and hazardous. The terms are too near together in the warm months, and too far apart in the remainder of the year. No change can be made without interfering with the terms in the other counties of the district.

5. The population of Madison, Jefferson, and Gallatin, the other counties in the district, will increase in the approaching years. The Utah and Northern Railroad will enter Madison this summer, and more lawsuits will be the result. A judge who discharges his duty in this part of the Territory will be compelled to neglect Custer County, which is now suffering many inconveniences in the enforcement of law.

6. About two hundred miles of the road are liable to raids by hostile Indians. Small bands from Sitting Bull's camp cross the British line very often and seek their old hunting-grounds for the purpose of stealing horses and committing other crimes.

A feeling of danger attends the traveler over this route, and affects all persons having any connection with the courts of the United States. It is needless to observe that the creation of a new district will cause the United States business to be transacted at Miles City for Custer County.

7. All the justices of the supreme court of Montana and a large majority of the attorneys support this measure. When there are four members of the supreme court, the judge who tried the cause cannot sit upon the hearing of the appeal from his decision, and arguments can be submitted to three justices without bias or prejudice. The bill now pending provides for this matter.

I have thus stated briefly my views of the situation. I have furnished the points without trying to make the elaborate argument which might convince Congress of the importance of this bill. Hoping that you will express to the appropriate committee your approval of this measure,

I am, very respectfully,

HENRY N. BLAKE.

Hon. CHARLES DEVENS, Attorney-General.

To the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, residents and practicing attorneys of the eastern part of the Territory of Montana, in view of the necessity of obtaining additional facilities for the administration of justice and the enforcement of the laws of the United States and of the Territory, would most respectfully represent:

That according to its present boundaries the Territory of Montana embraces an area some six hundred miles in length by about two hundred and seventy-five miles in breadth. The first settlements were made in the extreme western parts, and until within the past three years all subsequent settlers have sought homes within the limits of the few counties which were organized soon after the first establishment of our territorial government. Hitherto no railroads have been built, and until recently few settlers have occupied that part which must soon be appropriated for agricultural and grazing purposes, and which comprises the eastern two-thirds of the whole Territory. Within the limits referred to there is a large proportion of arable land, and the anticipated advent of the Northern Pacific Railroad has already brought among us many families from the older States, while thousands of others are certain to come as soon as more ready means of communication with the East shall be established.

Within the past three years it was found that there had arisen a necessity for the immediate establishment of courts of justice and a county government in Eastern Montana, and Custer County was organized, with its seat of justice at Miles City. The county thus organized comprises an area of about four hundred miles in length by about one hundred and fifty in breadth. But experience has since demonstrated, if it were not evident before, that the administration of justice at a place so far removed from the center of either of the three judicial districts of the Territory, as they have long been established, is a matter of extreme difficulty and often an impossibility.

Custer County has been included in the first judicial district of the Territory, but the associate justice assigned to that district resides at Virginia City, the only place for holding a United States court within the district, and at a distance of about four hundred and fifty miles from Miles City, the center of the settled portion of Eastern Montana.

There are within the limits referred to four different Indian reservations and three large military posts, and as a consequence a very large number of causes are constantly arising which are cognizable only by a court for the trial of causes arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States. In criminal causes of the class referred to, defendants are of necessity held to appear at a place hundreds of miles distant, and often at times when in the absence of railroads all means of travel and communication are practically suspended. Witnesses in these cases have of necessity to be recognized to appear at a time and place when and where an appearance involves a great outlay and sacrifice of time, expense, and personal interests. For a witness to spend a month of time and a hundred dollars or more over and above the compensation allowed by law is so great a sacrifice that any court must find it difficult and often impossible to compel attendance. While the United States is of necessity incurring a large expense in an effort to enforce its laws at a place so far removed from any of its courts—an expense which would be sufficient to maintain an additional court in this Territory—it is evident that such effort must in many cases prove abortive, and that offenders against its laws should go unpunished.

As the judicial districts of the Territory are at present constituted the people within the limits referred to are practically without a court of justice, except at two short terms, in the months of May and September, when the facilities for travel, then the best during the year, are such that the associate justice assigned to the district can only attend at a greatly disproportionate outlay of time and money. At all other times there is not usually any within a distance of four hundred and fifty miles who can perform the duties of a judge at chambers or grant the relief so often imperatively and immediately necessary in the progress of suits, and which is usually obtainable in courts of equity.

The inhabitants of this part of the Territory being very largely of a class accustomed to the due and orderly administration of justice in the older States, cannot but feel that the present judicial arrangements of the Territory are wholly inadequate, and that the defect must of necessity become more and more apparent in the near future.

Your memorialists would further represent that the appointment of an additional associate justice for Montana would make practicable a better organization of the supreme court of the Territory than is possible under existing laws. That court is practically a court of last resort in the great majority of cases. As is always the case in a newly settled country, the amounts in controversy are usually small, and but few cases arise in which there is a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, even if litigants could afford to submit to the additional delay and expense. Under the present system the judge who tried the cause below sits as a member of the court when it is heard on appeal, an arrangement which has always proved a source of dissatisfaction and distrust whenever it has been adopted in any of the older States, and which experience has always had occasion to condemn.

In view of the facts above set forth, your memorialists pray that action be taken by your honorable bodies authorizing the appointment at an early day of an additional associate justice of Montana, and requiring that in the supreme court of the Territory, when a cause is heard on appeal, the judge who sat upon the trial below shall be excluded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no demand for a second. Is debate desired? The Chair hears no one rising to debate the proposition, and therefore the question will be on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The rules were suspended, two-thirds voting in favor thereof, and the bill was passed.

CHEROKEE AND ARKANSAS RIVER RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. SLEMONS. I am directed by the Committee on Railways and Canals to move the rules be suspended, and the House Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of, and the bill (H. R. No. 6061) to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company be passed as it is proposed to be amended.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Thomas Nickerson, Sterne Morse, T. Jefferson Coolidge, B. P. Cheney, Alden Speare, Isaac T. Burr, Charles W. Pierce, C. J. Paine, F. H. Peabody, Thomas Dana, George B. Wilbur, Lucius G. Pratt, Solomon S. Sleeper, Warren Sawyer, and Levi C. Wade, of Massachusetts; W. B. Strong, E. Wilder, George T. Anthony, William P. Hackney, John M. Steele, E. H. Funston, Almerin Gillett, W. H. Guy, —— Hubbard, of Kansas; Granville Wilcox, of Arkansas; J. M. Keating, George W. Armistead, Edward Whitemore, of Tennessee, and Thomas Sherlock, of Ohio, their associates and successors are hereby incorporated under the name of "The Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company," with authority to construct, maintain, and operate a line of railroad and telegraph, beginning at Arkansas City, in the State of Kansas, and running through the Indian Territory, by the best practicable route, following, substantially, the general course of the Arkansas River, and bridging the same where necessary, to a point at or near Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas; and said corporation is vested with all the powers, privileges, and immunities necessary to carry into effect the purposes of this act, and is subject to all general laws which now are and hereafter may be in force relating to railroad corporations. The capital stock shall not exceed $1,300,000. It shall be divided into shares of the par value of $100 each, to be deemed personal property and transferable on the books of the corporation as the by-laws may prescribe.

SEC. 2. That within thirty days after the passage of this act the persons named in the first section, and their associates, shall meet pursuant to a notice signed by at least ten of said persons, a copy of which shall have been mailed to each of the others at least ten days before the time appointed. Ten of such persons shall constitute a quorum, and they shall organize under this act and choose not less than five persons to act as directors until others are chosen by the subscribers to the capital stock, who shall be called together for that purpose by the acting directors, upon not less than ten days' notice, when not less than 1,000 shares of said stock have been in good faith subscribed for. By-laws may be adopted at said last-named meeting, and the same may be altered, amended, or repealed, as may be therein provided. In each year thereafter there shall be a meeting of the stockholders, to be known as the annual meeting, for the choice of directors, not less than seven in number, all of whom shall be stockholders, and shall serve for the ensuing year, and until their successors are chosen.

SEC. 3. That the directors may make contracts and execute leases and conveyances and accept the same in the name of the corporation, transact all its business, provide for the construction, maintenance, and operation of the railroad and telegraph, and may mortgage the property and franchises of the corporation therefor, and are vested with all the powers necessary thereto. They shall give an account of their doings upon the request of any five stockholders at the annual meeting, and prior thereto shall submit to the stockholders a report of the condition of the railroad, telegraph, appurtenances, and equipment, the earnings, expenditures, indebtedness, assets, and liabilities of the corporation.

SEC. 4. That said corporation shall file in the office of the Secretary of the Interior, under its corporate seal, its acceptance of the provisions of this act within sixty days from the passage thereof, and shall then be entitled to the benefits of the provisions contained in sections 1 and 4 of the act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States."

SEC. 5. That said corporation, having complied with the requirements of section 4 of this act, is hereby authorized and empowered to construct its railroad and telegraph through any Indian lands or reservation when the same shall be necessary to the construction of its said line, and for that purpose to condemn a right of way to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of the central line of its said road, and shall have the right to take, from the lands adjacent to the line of said road, material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction and maintenance of said railroad and telegraph; also grounds adjacent to said right of way for stations, buildings, depots, machine-shops, side-tracks, turnouts, and wood, coal, and water stations, not to exceed twenty acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each ten miles of its road. And said corporation may enter upon and take private property subject to and in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and if at the time of such taking there shall be no judge of a court of record within said Indian Territory, or having jurisdiction over any part thereof, then condemnation shall be made and compensation paid for property taken and damages sustained under such regulations and before such tribunal as the President shall appoint. Said railroad and telegraph may be constructed through any military or other reservation set apart for the use of the United States.

SEC. 6. That this act is upon the express condition that said company shall begin to construct its line within six months, and complete the same within two years from the passage of this act, so as to perfect a through connection to the Mississippi River at Memphis, Tennessee, for both passengers and freight, without change or break of bulk.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Section 5, lines 8, 9, 10, and 11, strike out the following words:

"And shall have the right to take, from the lands adjacent to the line of said road, material, earth, stone, and timber necessary for the construction of said railroad and telegraph."

Same section, lines 15 and 16, insert the following words:

"Provided, That it does not conflict with existing treaties."

Section 1 strike out the following:

"Beginning at Arkansas City, in the State of Kansas, and running through the Indian Territory, by the best practicable route, following, substantially, the general course of the Arkansas River, and bridging the same where necessary, to a point at or near Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas."

And in lieu thereof insert:

"Under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War, to a point on a line between the State of Arkansas and the Indian Territory at Fort Smith, in said State."

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is there a report with this bill?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the reading of the report preclude debate afterward?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not want to interfere with debate, but the report is being read by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBINSON. The House would like to hear debate on such an important bill.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, the report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Railways and Canals, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 6061) providing for the incorporation of the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company, having had the same under consideration, respectfully report:

That said bill contemplates the construction of a railroad from Arkansas City, in the State of Kansas, along the general course of the Arkansas River, through the Indian Territory to Fort Smith, in the State of Arkansas.

The franchise or corporate powers asked for in said bill are such as are usually asked in similar cases, not asking any subsidy, land grant, or Government aid whatever, and in the opinion of the committee are such as ought to be granted in all cases where it can be lawfully done by the Congress of the United States.

The committee find that this line of railway would connect the southern and central portions of Kansas over the Little Rock and Fort Smith, and Memphis and Little Rock roads, with the Mississippi River at Memphis, thereby reaching the most profitable and natural market for the grain products of that portion of Kansas; and, Memphis being the chief distributing point for the surrounding States, great benefit would be conferred by such a connection.

The committee find that the contemplated line would pass through the lands of four tribes of friendly Indians in the Territory, all of whom have, by special treaties, conceded the right to Congress to grant the right of way through and over their lands.

The committee present the several sections of the treaties referred to, as follows:

Article 11 of the treaty of July 9, 1866, with the Cherokees, provides as follows:

"The Cherokee Nation hereby grant a right of way, not exceeding two hundred feet wide, except at stations, switches, water stations, or crossing of rivers, where more may be indispensable to the full enjoyment of the franchise herein granted, and then only two hundred additional feet shall be taken, and only for such length as may be absolutely necessary, through all their lands, to any company or corporation which shall be duly authorized by Congress to construct a railroad from any point north to any point south, and from any point east to any point west of, and which may pass through, the Cherokee Nation. Said companies or corporations, and their employés and laborers, while constructing and repairing the same and in operating said road or roads, including all necessary agents on the line at stations, switches, water-tanks, and all others necessary to the successful operation of a railroad, shall be protected in the discharge of their duties, and at all times subject to the Indian intercourse laws now or which may be hereafter enacted, and be in force in the Cherokee Nation."

Article 5 of the treaty with the Creeks, concluded June 14, 1866, provides as follows:

"The Creek Nation hereby grant a right of way through their lands to the Choctaw and Chickasaw country, to any company which shall be duly authorized by Congress, and shall, with the express consent and approbation of the Secretary of the Interior, undertake to construct a railroad from any point north of, to any point in or south of the Creek country, and likewise from any point on their eastern to their western or southern boundary; but said railroad company, together with all its agents and employés, shall be subject to the laws of the United States relating to intercourse with Indian tribes, and also to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for that purpose; and the Creeks agree to sell to the United States, or any company duly authorized as aforesaid, such lands not legally owned or occupied by a member or members of the Creek Nation, lying along the line of said contemplated railroad, not exceeding on each side thereof a belt or strip of land three miles in width, at such price per acre as may be eventually agreed upon between said Creek Nation and the party or parties building said road, subject to the approval of the President of the United States: Provided, however, That said lands thus sold shall not be reconveyed, leased, or rented to, or be occupied by any one not a citizen of the Creek Nation according to its laws and recognized usages: Provided, also, That officers, servants, and employés of said railroad, necessary to its construction and management, shall not be excluded from such necessary occupancy, they being subject to the provisions of the Indian intercourse law and such rules and regulations as may be established by the Secretary of the Interior, nor shall any conveyance of any of said lands be made to the party building and managing said road until its completion as a first-class railroad, and its acceptance as such by the Secretary of the Interior."

Article 10 of the treaty with the Kansas Indians, concluded October 5, 1859, provides as follows:

"It is agreed that all roads and highways laid out by authority of law shall have right of way through the lands within the reservation hereinbefore specified, on the same terms as are provided by law when roads and highways are made through lands of citizens of the United States; and railroad companies, when the lines pass through the lands of said Indians, shall have right of way on payment of a just compensation therefor in money."

Article 11 of the treaty with the Big and Little Osage Indians, concluded September 29, 1865, provides as follows:

"It is agreed that all roads and highways laid out by the State or General Government shall have right of way through the remaining lands of said Indians, on the same terms as are provided by law when made through the lands of citizens of the United States; and railroad companies, when the lines of their roads necessarily pass through the lands of said Indians, shall have right of way upon payment of a fair compensation therefor."

The foregoing sections are copied in full from the published treaties, and the committee are of opinion that the rights they confer are full and complete; the railroad to be constructed passing from the east to the west of the Cherokee and Creek Nations. The bill is drawn in accordance with the provisions of said several treaties, with the special proviso that the franchise is granted subject to existing treaties.

The committee are of opinion, and so report, that the granting of this franchise and the construction of the railroad will not only be of great public benefit to the sections connected thereby, but will also be of great benefit to the Indians themselves, by furnishing an efficient and speedy method for the pursuit and arrest of criminals taking refuge in their territory, and also by a cheaper and speedier method of delivering their supplies, mails, &c., as well as by giving them a market for their products, and stimulating their productive capacity, which is the surest and best incentive to civilization.

The citizens of Kansas at present find their best market in the States in the Lower Mississippi Valley, and to reach it have to go around by way of a long all-rail route, whereas when this line is constructed the distance will be shortened fully one-half—being now nearly one thousand miles—but by the proposed line would be less than five hundred miles.

For these reasons the committee recommend the passage of the bill with amendments.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask a second upon that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already asked the question whether a second was demanded and no one responded to the demand. It is now open for debate under the rule.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not hear the request for a second or I should have insisted upon it.

Mr. WILLITS. I think, if the Chair will permit me, that there is a mistake here. The reading of the report was called for.

The SPEAKER. The report was subsequently called for and the Chair asked unanimous consent for the reading of it, to which there was no objection. But the Chair does not or will not take advantage of any gentleman. If a second is demanded the Chair will consider the demand. Debate is now in order.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask my friend from Tennessee a question, whether there is anything in this bill which parts with money or property of the Government or gives any aid to the construction of this road?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. There is nothing whatever but the right of way. There is no aid or assistance whatever given by the Government.

Mr. COX. And under the treaties with the Indians there is nothing which will deprive them of their rights?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The treaties have just been read as a part of the report from the Revised Statutes.

Mr. ATKINS. Then this is in accordance with the treaties?

Mr. YOUNG. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCALES. I ask my friend from Tennessee to permit an amendment to this bill, by consent, to cover the point raised.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, with the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let us know where the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina is to come in.

Mr. HOOKER. I wish to ask a parliamentary question. Is the bill not subject to an amendment now?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. SCALES. Is it subject to debate?

The SPEAKER. It is; but the motion is to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. HOOKER. I have understood that under similar circumstances amendments have been admitted.

The SPEAKER. That is when a bill is brought up for consideration. The gentleman will remember that this is a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments reported from the committee.

Mr. SCALES. There is fifteen minutes' debate allowed on each side?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. HOOKER. I wish to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOOKER. I wish to ask again if it is not in order to offer an amendment to the bill?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules it is not.

Mr. HOOKER. Has it not been so construed on a similar occasion under the same motion?

The SPEAKER. Not under this motion. This is to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from its consideration and adopt the bill with the amendments recommended by the committee.

Mr. HOOKER. Then this further inquiry, would it be in order to amend the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee so as to consider the bill?

The SPEAKER. It would not; the gentleman has absolute control, by direction of the committee, for the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. SCALES. Might not an amendment be incorporated by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. That of course can be done.

Mr. REED. I would like to ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question, whether this bill provides for the consent of the tribes through whose territory this proposed road passes?

Mr. SCALES. That is the object of my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman reporting the bill as having control of the floor to open the discussion.

Mr. SLEMONS. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Maine at this time. The bill does not provide for their consent and for the reason that under the treaties they are all protected. The principal reason, however, why this was not provided for in the bill was because it was supposed that they might undertake to blackmail the railroad company after getting a charter and in that way prevent it. I will answer the gentleman further and say that, with the consent of the committee, I have no personal objection to incorporating an amendment in the bill, if the House deems it necessary.

Mr. SCALES. I will ask, then, to offer my amendment by consent.

Mr. REED. If there is no objection, let it be read.

Mr. HOOKER. Let it be read for information.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, the amendment can be considered as pending to the bill. It will be read, without objection, for information.

Mr. SCALES. I wish to say that I am in favor of the bill myself. I have no objection to it, but I think it advisable to add some such provision as this.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following proviso:

"Provided, That this act shall not go into effect until the tribes of Indians through whose territory this road may run shall, in a council of their respective tribes, called together under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, give their consent to this said act and signify the same to the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. SLEMONS. I see no objection myself to that amendment; I am willing to accept it.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I hope it will be adopted.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, the amendment is allowed to be considered as pending under the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments recommended by the committee.

Mr. DUNN. I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina, as I do not know whether I understand his amendment or not, does it require that the Indians shall give consent to this act of Congress?

Mr. SCALES. Yes, sir; to that part ceding land in their territory.

Mr. DUNN. The amendment should be so worded that it would not require them to give their consent to an act of Congress, but simply to the sale of the right of way. They ought not to have the right, as this would seem to imply, to pass upon the validity of an act of Congress.

Mr. SCALES. That is certainly not the intent of this amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. It is only to give the consent, as I understand it, to the right of way to this railroad company.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If I can get the attention of the House for a few moments I think the gentleman from North Carolina will consent to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. WEAVER. I wish, by consent, to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] one question: Would his amendment also require that the Indians should give their consent to parting with twenty acres of land every ten miles for depot purposes?

Mr. SCALES. My amendment provides they shall give their consent to every matter in which they are interested.

Mr. WEAVER. Let the amendment be read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely anxious for the passage of this bill because it is in the interest of a large section of country and a vast number of people; and if I believed the rejection of the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] would endanger its passage I would consent at once to its being adopted by the House. But I desire to say to him and to other gentlemen who may think such an amendment is necessary to protect the rights of the Indians that to adopt his amendment would be practically to defeat the object of this bill.

I do not believe any railroad bill was ever submitted to this House more carefully drawn, in which the rights of the Government and the rights of the Indians were more thoroughly protected than they are in this one. It provides that the road shall be constructed, if constructed at all, in pursuance of treaty stipulations already existing between the Government and the Indian tribes. It provides for a condemnation of all the land that is necessary to be had under the provisions of existing law and the Indians will receive just such compensation as white men would receive. Now to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina would have unquestionably the effect which everybody must see at a glance. Every one knows, I presume, how easily a council of Indian tribes may be managed by those disposed to resort to the necessary means for that purpose and whose interest it would serve. The only objection I apprehend in any section or from any quarter to the passage of this bill will come from some rival railroad corporation. And if it is made a condition-precedent to this bill taking effect and going into operation that the consent of the Indian tribes shall first be had in addition to the treaty stipulations, the probability is that some other railroad interest will so influence the council of the Indian tribes that that consent will never be had and the bill will be practically defeated in its operations.

There is no gentleman upon this floor who is more anxious to preserve and protect the rights of the Indians than I am. I have manifested that anxiety on many occasions by my speeches and by my votes. I have often denounced the policy of the Government in reference to these helpless, defenseless, and greatly wronged people. They have not a single right under the law that I would not defend here to the utmost extremity. But I know that the construction of this road will confer upon them more benefits perhaps than will arise under any legislation affecting their interests that has passed this House for the last decade of years. If you want to carry to them the blessings of civilization, adopt the agencies that have carried them all over this continent to the white man. Give them railroad communication and the benefits of commercial intercourse and you will take a longer step in the direction of civilizing the Indian tribes than by any other measure of legislation of which I can think at present.

Mr. LAPHAM. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. LAPHAM. Does either of the treaties provide the right of the companies to take all the timber necessary for the construction and maintenance of the road?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. No, sir; but the treaties provide a right of construction for two railway lines through the Territories.

Mr. LAPHAM. They give the right of way simply?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Yes, sir; but I was going on further to say I presume that would carry with it the right to take the necessary sod, stone, and other material to construct the road.

Mr. LAPHAM. But there is here an express provision to take all the necessary timber from the Indian lands to construct the road.

Mr. MANNING. That is stricken out by the committee.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. That has been stricken out; but even if it were not I would still contend that was not an objectionable feature, but was a necessary part by implication of the treaties already existing between the Indians and the Government, because it would be idle to say there should be a right of way and deny the use of all the means to make it effective. It is not necessary, however, to discuss that, for it is no longer a part of the bill.

One word as to the importance of this measure, and I will yield the floor. I do not believe any railroad measure that has been before this House for many years was more strongly recommended to legislative favor than this one. It will benefit more people and promote larger commercial interests, I believe, than any other that has received legislative sanction. The contemplated road penetrates the finest grain and meat growing country on the continent. At Wichita, in Kansas, the point it is designed primarily to reach, there was last year shipped to Saint Louis, Kansas City, and Chicago, and afterward reshipped south, 20,000,000 bushels of wheat, 30,000,000 bushels of corn, more than 2,000,000 of hogs, and a vast number of beef-cattle. Now, let this fact be borne in mind, that all the home domestic market for the grain and meat products of the West is found in the region south of Memphis, which is the distributing point of all the grain and meat products of that region on their way to the consumers further south.

By our present system of railways and means of communication between the South and that section from which these products come, they have to be transported by a circuitous route from one thousand to fifteen hundred miles by railway and water communication, by way of Saint Louis, Kansas City, or Chicago, before reaching Memphis, the point of distribution and primary market, so that the people of all the West, the vast grain-growing region, and those in the cotton States where markets for their products are found, are directly and immediately interested in the construction of this road.

I have no objection to guarding the rights of the Indians just as closely and thoroughly as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr.

SCALES] desires to do, did I not labor under the serious apprehension that if his amendment is adopted it will in the end render the bill a nullity for the reasons that I have already given.

Mr. ROBESON. Before the gentleman sits down, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. ROBESON. The only question I have in my mind in regard to this bill is just this: When we organize a company or a corporation and give it that part of the eminent domain of the Government which allows it to take private property, for right of way, for instance, we make certain provisions for guarding the exercise of that right. I would not give to these Indians in the Indian Territory any more privileges in guarding their property rights than I would give to anybody else. But I believe that these tribes are entitled to a certain property interest in the reservations upon which they are settled in the Indian Territory.

Now, this bill provides that after this corporation has done certain things, it shall receive the benefits and be entitled to the provisions of section 1 of the act of March 3, 1875, "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States." That being an act to dispose of the public lands only, and of no private interests, that section of the act of March 3, 1875, provides that railroads shall have the right of way for one hundred feet through the public lands. That would dispose of all the rights of the United States in that Territory. But how are the property rights of the Indian tribes on their reservations protected in this bill? That is the question I want to ask.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I apprehend that there is no invasion of the rights of the Indians in this bill. It provides for the condemnation of property under existing provisions of law.

Mr. ROBESON. No, I do not so understand it. I understand that it provides that when this corporation has complied with certain things it is to have the benefit of the section which I have read, which section gives it everything the United States can give except the right of eminent domain, the right to take the property of private citizens, including Indians. Now, where are the provisions under which that right is to be exercised?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If I understand the gentleman, he concedes the proposition that under the existing law, under the law of eminent domain, the Indians have no more rights than white men.

Mr. ROBESON. No more.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes asked for in advocacy of this bill at the commencement of this discussion has been exhausted.

Mr. ROBESON. I will yield all my time to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG.] [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no time to yield.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I have very little more to say.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] can use all the fifteen minutes in advocacy of the bill if he chooses at this time; but the Chair would suggest that perhaps it would be well to reserve some portion of the time to reply to what may be said in opposition to the bill.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] yield to me for a moment or two in connection with the inquiry of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON?]

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. After I make a parliamentary inquiry, I will. I would inquire of the Chair if a vote can be first taken on the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES?]

The SPEAKER. There is no vote to be taken except upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the amendments recommended by the committee. The Chair understood that by unanimous consent the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] was allowed to submit his amendment and have it pending with the others, to be voted into the bill if passed by a two-third vote, or to fall with the bill by reason of a failure to obtain a two-third vote. Since the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] began speaking, the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] has been modified by that gentleman, and the Chair thinks it had better be read now as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was read, as follows:

Provided, That this act shall not go into effect until the tribes of Indians through whose territory this road may run shall, in a council of their respective tribes called together under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, give their consent to the right of way and the condemnation of their property, and signify the same to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WHITE. I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] yields to me a moment, in connection with the inquiry of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.] The gentleman from New Jersey has asked a very proper question; but he stopped short——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the time now being occupied should not be taken out of the time allowed for the advocacy of the bill. The Chair will therefore recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] as occupying a part of the time for opposition to the bill.

Mr. WHITE. Very well. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] makes the point that there is no provision in this bill for the assessment of damages to parties whose lands may be invaded by the proposed corporation. The gentleman, however, has stopped short at the close of section 4 of the bill. If he will read section 5 he will observe that that question is carefully provided for. The section is as follows:

The said corporation, having complied with the requirements of section 4 of this act, is hereby authorized and empowered to construct its railroad and telegraph through any Indian lands or reservation when the same shall be necessary to the construction of its said line, and for that purpose to condemn a right of way to the extent of one hundred feet on each side of the central line of its said road; also grounds adjacent to said right of way for stations, buildings, depots, machine-shops, side-tracks, turnouts, and wood, coal, and water stations, not to exceed twenty acres for each station, to the extent of one station for each ten miles of its road: Provided, That it does not conflict with existing treaties. And said corporation may enter upon and take private property subject to and in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act, approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and if at the time of such taking there shall be no judge of a court of record within said Indian Territory, or having jurisdiction over any part thereof, then condemnation shall be made and compensation paid for property taken and damages sustained under such regulations and before such tribunal as the President shall appoint. Said railroad and telegraph may be constructed through any military or other reservation set apart for the use of the United States.

Now, I have in my hand section 3 of the act indicated, which regulates in detail the method of proceeding for taking property, appraising damages, and all the incidents thereto, as prescribed in the statutes of the different States. So that this provision of the fifth section answers fully the criticism made by the gentleman from New Jersey. Finding this provision in the bill, I for one intend to support it, having been influenced to that extent by the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. YOUNG.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to understand whether consent is given (for it requires unanimous consent) that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina and now modified shall come in to be voted on under the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. CHALMERS. I object.

Mr. ROBESON. I suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill, that after the section applying to this railroad the condemnatory powers which were given in reference to the Union Pacific Railroad there be inserted a provision of this kind:

Provided, That there shall be included in the rights protected by that section the rights which belong to Indians in their tribal relations.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to that amendment. My friend from Arkansas [Mr. SLEMONS] has charge of the bill under direction of his committee, and I of course defer to him.

Mr. ROBESON. I only want the provision extended so as to protect property rights belonging to the Indians in their tribal relations.

Mr. WHITE. That is already included in the provision I have just read.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I think the provisions of the bill are ample to meet the objection intimated by the gentleman from New Jersey. If not, I am sure there will be no objection to incorporating such an amendment as he suggests.

Mr. SLEMONS. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] will withdraw his amendment, I will accept that of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SCALES. I would like to hear the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey read. Will he be kind enough to reduce it to writing?

Mr. ROBESON. I propose for the acceptance of the gentleman this amendment, to come in at the end of section 5:

Provided, That the property rights belonging to Indians in their tribal relations shall be included among the property rights protected by this section.

Several MEMBERS. That is all right.

Mr. SCALES. What are the property rights protected by that section?

Mr. ROBESON. The section relating to the Union Pacific Railroad provides for the protection of rights of private property. My amendment proposes to protect to the same extent any rights belonging to these Indians in their tribal relations.

Mr. SCALES. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SLEMONS. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now state the motion again. It is to suspend the rules to take from the House Calendar the bill which has been read, and to pass the same, with the amendments recommended by the Committee on Railways and Canals and the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, now accepted by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. SLEMONS,] with the consent of the House.

Mr. WILLITS. I would like to put a question to the gentleman in charge of this bill. At the end of the fifth section I find these words:

And if at the time of such taking there shall be no judge of a court of record within said Indian Territory, or having jurisdiction over any part thereof, then condemnation shall be made and compensation paid for property taken and damages sustained, under such regulations and before such tribunal as the President shall appoint.

I would like to know what tribunal the gentleman supposes could be selected by the President, and what regulations would be likely to be made, and whether it is competent——

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If there is no court, the Secretary of the Interior might be vested with power to carry the law into effect; but it is not likely that any difficulty of this kind will arise.

Mr. WILLITS. I would like to know whether it is competent by law to authorize the President of the United States to make regulations to condemn my land or any other man's land.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. He simply makes regulations according to law.

Mr. WILLITS. What law?

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The law which authorizes the condemnation of private property for public uses. If he be authorized by the provisions of this bill to do it, and the bill passes, he will have all the authority for that purpose which any law of Congress can give him. But there will be no trouble on this point.

The SPEAKER. In the same manner as provided in the third section of the act with reference to the Union Pacific Railroad.

Mr. WILLITS. I want to know whether this is included in the act with regard to the Union Pacific Railroad.

Mr. SLEMONS. The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey covers the case precisely.

Mr. WILLITS. I do not so understand. That simply applies to the character of the property taken; this relates to the method of taking it.

Mr. SLEMONS. The courts of the United States have jurisdiction over the Indian country.

Mr. WILLITS. My point is as to the making of regulations by the President of the United States. That provision, it strikes me, is too indefinite for the condemnation of any man's land.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. SLEMONS] to suspend the rules and pass this bill with the amendments recommended by the committee, and that proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] and accepted by the gentleman making this motion.

Mr. MURCH. I demand the yeas and nays.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 86.

Mr. HOOKER demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were refused.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered; one-fifth not having voted in favor thereof.

The question recurred on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the proposed amendments.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 20.

Mr. MURCH. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point of no quorum having been raised, the Chair will appoint Mr. MURCH and Mr. SLEMONS as tellers.

The House again divided; and there were—ayes 121, noes 34.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended, and the bill with the proposed amendments was passed.

EVENING SESSION FOR DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask, Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent that Wednesday evening of this week be set apart for the consideration of business relating to the District of Columbia instead of Thursday evening, it being believed that on Thursday evening a quorum cannot be secured.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

SUITS AT LAW AFFECTING TITLE TO MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am directed by the Committee on Mines and Mining to move that the rules be suspended and the House Calendar discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1280) to amend section 2326 of the Revised Statutes relating to suits at law affecting the title to mining claims, and the same be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That if, in any action brought pursuant to section 2326 of the Revised Statutes, title to the ground in controversy shall not be established by either party, the jury shall so find, and judgment shall be entered according to the verdict. In such case costs shall not be allowed to either party, and the claimant shall not proceed in the land office or be entitled to a patent for the ground in controversy until he shall have perfected his title.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will yield now to the gentleman from Colorado to make an explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there a second to the motion to suspend the rules? The Chair hears no objection, and takes it for granted there is a second.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that this bill at the last session was reported to the House by the unanimous action of the Committee on Mines and Mining. It was prepared with the approval of Judge Hallett, judge of the United States district court for the State of Colorado. All it seeks to do is to secure justice to litigants in mining suits. A man makes application for a Government patent to a mining claim. The law requires him to publish in the newspapers a certain notice, and if any one claims to have an adverse interest in the mining claim sought to be patented the statute requires him to file an adverse claim in the land office, and within thirty days to bring suit in a court of competent jurisdiction to determine the right of possession to the property so sought to be patented. Now, it frequently happens in a mining State that one man is desirous of stealing another man's property by obtaining a patent to which he is not entitled. That is a pretty broad proposition; but I have seen instances of it.

In other words, I may make an application for a Government patent to a mining claim and run the lines of my survey right over the claim owned by another party. I then go into the land office and make my application. The other party is required to file an adverse claim and bring an action of ejectment in a court of competent jurisdiction and prosecute that suit with reasonable diligence to final judgment. If he fails by reason of defect in his papers, in the certificate of location or anything of that sort, and judgment goes against him, that judgment is certified to the land office, and the land office issues a patent to the very party who is not really entitled to the claim and who succeeds only by virtue of the fact that the adverse claimant has failed by some curable defect in his title to establish his ownership to the property in controversy.

I have seen instances of this kind occur frequently in the courts of the country where mining litigation has been had, and the evil has grown so great that Judge Hallett, who was chief-justice of Colorado for twelve years during its territorial condition, and is now the judge of the United States district court, suggested a measure of this kind to meet the difficulty.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BELFORD. Certainly.

Mr. ATKINS. In what particular does the gentleman propose to amend section 2326?

Mr. BELFORD. I propose to amend it so that, if it appears on the trial of the cause that neither the plaintiff nor the defendant is entitled to the property in controversy, the jury shall return that verdict to the judge, and thereupon it shall operate as stay of proceedings upon the part of the applicant in procuring his patent until the court is satisfied he has a just and reasonable claim to the ground he seeks to appropriate. That is the sole object of this act. As the matter stands now under this mining act I can make application for a patent, run the lines of my survey over your claim, compel you to file an adverse claim and bring an action of ejectment, and then, if you fail to win your suit, by reason of that failure under the law as it stands it is absolutely competent for me to obtain a patent to that land, although I may have no valid claim to it at all. It may be a cold, naked, bold piece of stealing and robbery. It was to cure that defect and to prevent that evil the United States district judge suggested a bill of this sort. I say that it is just and right and the bill ought to pass. It ought to pass in the interest of justice and in the interest of honest litigants.

The SPEAKER. Is any further debate desired? The Chair hears no member who wishes to speak, and the question will be put to the House.

The question recurred on Mr. STEVENSON'S motion, and it was agreed to; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced the adoption by that body of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 6719) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes.

It further announced the passage, without amendment, of joint resolution (H. R. No. 378) providing for the printing and distribution of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1880.

It further announced the passage of the following bills; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. No. 543) for the relief of Jabez Burchard;

A bill (S. No. 858) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees and commissions paid on void entries of public lands, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. No. 986) for the relief of Thomas I. Miller, of Washington Territory;

A bill (S. No. 1422) concerning the pay of engineers in the Navy; and

A bill (S. No. 1719) for the relief of Paulina Jones, the widow of Alexander Jones, deceased, Company E, Second North Carolina Infantry.

ENROLLED BILLS, ETC.

Mr. WARD, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 386) for printing report of the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 1004) for the relief of the sureties of Henry L. Norvell; and

A bill (S. No. 1728) granting a pension to Mrs. Lelia E. McCauley.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 3047) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to recommend a proper site for a union railroad depot in the city of Washington, and for other purposes.

ENLARGEMENT OF CITY HALL, WASHINGTON.

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, under instructions from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I am directed to move that the bill of the Senate (No. 1349) for the enlargement of the City Hall for the accommodation of the courts and records of the District of Columbia be taken from the Speaker's table, the rules suspended, and it be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the sum of $117,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in enlarging the City Hall so as to afford additional accommodations for the courts of the District and for fire-proof rooms for the safe keeping of the records of the courts and of the District of Columbia, according to the general plan furnished by the Architect of the Capitol Extension, and under the supervision of that officer.

The SPEAKER. Is there a second demanded?

There was no demand for a second.

Mr. HAWLEY. What is the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill?

Mr. COOK. One hundred and seventeen thousand dollars.

Mr. HAWLEY. I would have been better satisfied if the bill had proposed to tear away the whole of that old building and put up a respectable one in its place.

Mr. NEAL. They must use that old building until a new one can be put up.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The house divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 23.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the bill was passed.

AMENDMENTS TO SINKING-FUND ACT.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules, under instructions from the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, and put upon its passage the bill (H. R. No. 5637) to alter and amend the sinking fund act, approved May 7, 1878.

The SPEAKER. The bill to which the gentleman from Maryland refers is on the House Calendar, and will be read.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. WEAVER. Is it now in order to demand a second?

The SPEAKER. Is there a second demanded?

Mr. WEAVER. I demand a second by tellers.

Mr. McLANE. Is it in order to make an explanation to the House before the vote is taken?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order at this time.

Mr. McLANE. I desire simply in justice to make a brief statement, in order to explain to the House that the only feature——

Mr. WEAVER. I insist upon the demand for a second.

Mr. McLANE. The only feature that is new——

Mr. WEAVER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa insists upon a strict enforcement of the rule. The demand having been made for a second by tellers, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. McLANE and Mr. WEAVER were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 40, noes 47.

So a second was refused.

The SPEAKER. A second being refused, the bill is not before the House.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave to withdraw papers in the case of Moses Halpp was granted to Mr. JONES, there being no adverse report.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KELLEY, for two days, on account of important business;

To Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family; and

To Mr. CHALMERS, for two days from to-day.

EDUCATIONAL FUND.

Mr. GOODE. By direction of the Committee on Education and Labor, I move to suspend the rules and take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 133, to establish an educational fund, &c., and substitute therefor the provisions of the House bill No. 334, reported by the House Committee on Education and Labor.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 133) to establish an educational fund, and apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to public education, and to provide for the more complete endowment and support of national colleges for the advancement of scientific and industrial education.

The SPEAKER. The Senate bill will first be read. It is then proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and insert the House bill in lieu thereof.

Mr. WHITE. I ask for the reading of the bill, and afterward I shall demand a second by tellers.

Mr. KEIFER. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will not press the consideration of that bill at this time.

Mr. GOODE. I am only obeying the instructions of the committee.

Mr. KEIFER. I am in favor of some of its provisions, but I hope that it will not be pressed now.

Mr. GOODE. I repeat that I am acting under directions of the Committee on Education and Labor of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. Could not some evening be fixed for its consideration?

Mr. GILLETTE. I would suggest that an evening be fixed.

Mr. GOODE. I have no authority to consent to such an arrangement.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Senate bill, after which the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania to ask a second.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. The House bill will now be read.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONGER. Should not this bill have its first discussion in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend the rules, and among others to suspend the rule under which the gentleman from Michigan would raise the point of order.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. The House bill has not yet been read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has directed it to be read.

Mr. CONGER. Does the motion to suspend the rules include not only the Senate bill but also the substitute?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules so as to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill and bring it before the House, then to substitute the House bill as recommended by the Committee on Education and Labor for the Senate bill by striking out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill and inserting as a substitute the House bill.

Mr. CONGER. Is that all in one motion?

The SPEAKER. It is; complicated as the statement of the motion may appear.

Mr. CONGER. Does it not place all the homesteads of the future in jeopardy?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not able to answer that question, as it is not a parliamentary one.

Mr. CONGER. I wish the Chair was in a position to answer it.

The SPEAKER. The occupant of the chair would answer promptly if he were on the floor.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE. I want the decision of the Chair on this question. I do not see under what authority this proceeding can be conducted.

The SPEAKER. Under authority of the rule.

Mr. WHITE. What rule?

The SPEAKER. The rule authorizing on certain days motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. WHITE. Very well. I understand that rule under the practice merely authorizes the calling up of a bill and moving to suspend the rules and put that bill on its passage——

The SPEAKER. Oh, no.

Mr. WHITE. While this proceeding involves the power of amendment also.

The SPEAKER. That has been repeatedly done, and has been done to-day in fact. It was done to-day with reference to an amendment offered in the House.

Mr. WHITE. I suggest that that was done by consent, and that the point was not raised.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing in the motion with reference to this bill that is not in accordance with the rule of the House providing for motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. WHITE. I desire the Chair to understand my position. I understand the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, has been instructed by his committee to move to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill which has just been read. Now it is perfectly proper to put that bill on its passage under a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. GOODE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is mistaken. I am instructed by the Committee on Education and Labor to make the identical motion I have made, to take from the Speaker's table bill S. No. 133 and ask the House to substitute therefor the provisions of House bill No. 334.

Mr. WHITE. That involves the very question I raised. I say that cannot be done, because it involves the power of amendment. I say in this proceeding while we can pass the original bill we cannot amend.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion to suspend the rules, including the power which regulates the action of the House as to amendments.

Mr. WHITE. Could I offer a substitute for the bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recognized for that purpose, and has not the authority of a committee.

Mr. WHITE. But suppose I had; suppose I was a colleague of the gentleman from Virginia on the committee. I merely make the point that it is a violation of the rule to seek to amend a bill in this way.

The SPEAKER. It is not a violation of the rule to move to suspend the rules, the Chair thinks, in the manner as stated by the gentleman from Virginia. The remedy is in the House.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot think it is possible that the Committee on Rules ever contemplated the substitution at the moment of the suspension of the rules of an entirely different bill to which the attention of the House has not been called.

The SPEAKER. It has been the practice of the House ever since the present occupant of the chair has been a member of it to allow a suspension of the rules to bring a bill before the House and to include in that motion a power to amend, and there is no difference in principle between the power to amend by a substitute and the power to amend by making amendments in different parts of the bill. If the House possesses the power to amend by amendments running through the bill, it has also the power to amend by a substitution of an entire bill for the original one. In fact, it is a proceeding very frequent in the House, not under a suspension even, that a motion may be made to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert such and such as a substitute for the original bill.

Mr. CONGER. If it were proper to allude to anything done in committee, I think the Chair's recollection would bear out my own in saying that no such proposition was contemplated in this new rule.

The SPEAKER. None was ever discussed, so far as the Chair knows.

Mr. CONGER. It was referred to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is under a misapprehension. The gentleman thinks we are proceeding under a new rule. We are not. We are proceeding under the rule providing for motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. CONGER. Reported by the committee a year or two ago as a new rule.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. CONGER. That is the time I refer to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was not a member of the Committee on Rules at that time, and cannot therefore tell what then took place in that committee.

Mr. CONGER. No; but I can state what occurred in the committee when I was present, and I have been present at several sessions of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The change made on the report of the Committee on Rules from the former rule upon the subject was to provide first for a second by tellers, and then for debate of fifteen minutes on each side, so that a bill could not be passed under a suspension of the rules without there being at least fifteen minutes in which individual members could state their objections to it. The Chair thinks that is a great improvement on the old rules.

Mr. CONGER. This motion is to pass a bill with amendments which the House can know nothing of and the country can know nothing of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has directed that the provisions of the House bill which it is proposed to substitute for the Senate bill shall be now read.

The Clerk read the House bill.

Mr. WHITE. I now call for a second by tellers on the motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. That is the gentleman's right; and the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WHITE, and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. GOODE, to act as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 68, noes 85.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next committee in order for motions to suspend the rules is the Committee on the Militia. [No response.] The next committee is the Committee on Patents.

CLASSIFIED ABRIDGMENT OF UNITED STATES PATENTS.

Mr. VANCE. I am instructed by the Committee on Patents to move that the rules be so suspended as to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5066) to provide for the preparation of classified abridgments of all letters-patent of the United States, and that the same be now passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $10,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Patents in the preparation of classified abridgments of all letters-patent of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the said abridgments shall be printed, and one copy of each shall be furnished to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress; one copy to each of eight public libraries to be designated by each Senator, Representative, and Delegate; and two copies to the Library of Congress; and also copies to such foreign governments, libraries, and learned societies as the Commissioner of Patents may designate: Provided, That copies shall be sold at the cost of printing, and all sums received from such sale shall, on or before the first day of each month, be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. WHITE. I call for a second.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. WHITE, and the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. VANCE.

Mr. WHITE. I withdraw the demand for the second. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBOTT. I renew it. I withdraw the demand. [Laughter.]

There being no objection, the motion was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill as read.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask my friend——

The SPEAKER. Fifteen minutes' debate on each side is now in order.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not want to debate it; I want to ask how much the bill proposes to appropriate?

Mr. VANCE. The sum of $10,000.

Mr. BRAGG. How many clerks are to be employed, and is it arranged who they are to be?

Mr. VANCE. There is no provision about that.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 4661, beg leave to report a substitute for the same, and recommend its passage.

The interests of the public and of the office imperatively demand that provision be made without further delay for the preparation of a general analytical and descriptive index of inventions and discoveries. Thirty years ago Commissioner Ewbank, in his annual report for 1848, to which attention is respectfully invited, urged this subject upon the consideration of Congress. He said:

"However serviceable to applicants the appointment of examiners has proved, the system of search is necessarily defective for want of such a work. It is impossible in every case that comes before them to wade through the numerous treatises, journals, foreign and domestic encyclopedias, &c., and the piles of specifications and caveats in the office. Their whole time would not suffice for this. Yet, to arrive at a safe conclusion, the contents should be known to them. Patents have been issued for devices already figured and described in popular journals. A general and analytical index only can prevent this. For want of it the labors of the examiners result in no permanent advantage to the public, the office, or to inventors other than those on whose inventions they pass. No results are recorded; and hence (except when the memory of an examiner supersedes the necessity) the same routine of reference to serial and standard works, to models, specifications, &c., is, without ceasing, repeated.

* * * * * * *

"It would be difficult to overrate the saving of time, money, material, and mental expenditure that would accrue to the country if the ingenious had the means of readily ascertaining what has been done in the lines of their speculation. A very inadequate idea may be gathered from the number of applications for patents rejected and suspended yearly for want of novelty or merit. In 1848 there were nine hundred and sixty-eight, and in 1849 over fourteen hundred. Yet cases that come under the notice of this office constitute but a small part of the labors of those who sacrifice years in unfruitful researches for lack of information which an index of inventions would give them.

"In a pecuniary point of view, such a work is therefore most desirable to this office, to inventors, and the public at large. When made accessible to popular reference it will be the saving of millions. No state paper could surpass it in importance, nor in lasting value. Till it is done a majority of applicants for patents must continue to meet with some disappointment. The only safe rule with them is always to make themselves acquainted with what has been attempted before incurring any serious outlay. They should never presume that their devices have not entered other heads than their own until, by a searching inquisition on every hand, the presumption remains in their favor unimpaired. No better advice than this can be given them. But how are they to follow it? Nineteen-twentieths have few or no reliable sources of information within their reach, and not one in a hundred can afford the expenses of a visit to Washington and a residence there for the purpose of consulting the office records and library."

Each succeeding year has augmented the force of most of the reasons suggested by Commissioner Ewbank for the preparation of this index. It is impossible now to estimate the advantages which inventors, the public, and this office would derive from such a work if it were in the hands of the examiners and accessible to the public. The saving of time and money which would result from its use to the office would be immense. It is, of course, impossible to estimate the millions that would be saved to inventors, and to those who use inventions, if the knowledge which it would furnish could be accessible to them.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is this $10,000 simply for the work of preparing this abridgment, or is it to cover the cost of printing?

Mr. VANCE. Preparing and printing.

Mr. BLOUNT. How many copies?

Mr. VANCE. That has not yet been determined.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then, I do not see how you can estimate the cost.

Mr. VANCE. It is to be under the direction of the Commissioner of Patents.

The SPEAKER. The expense not to exceed $10,000.

Mr. VANCE. The expense not to exceed $10,000. And it is also provided that copies may be printed for sale.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill to accept an amendment.

Mr. VANCE. I will hear it.

Mr. HATCH. I move to amend by inserting after the words "out of any moneys" the words "belonging to the patent fund."

Mr. VANCE. The committee have no objection to that amendment.

The SPEAKER. By consent that can be considered as embraced in the original motion.

Mr. VANCE. I hope there will be no objection in passing the bill with that provision in it.

The motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the proposed amendment was then agreed to, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof.)

Mr. SMITH, of New Jersey, asked and obtained permission to have printed in the RECORD some remarks upon the bill just passed. [See Appendix.]

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. CONVERSE asked and obtained consent for the withdrawal from the files of the House of papers in the case of John Garahty; no adverse report.

HUGH BLAIR STUART.

Mr. HERBERT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 7224) granting a pension to Hugh Blair Stuart; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. ACKLEN. Pending that motion, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next.

Several MEMBERS. Why?

Mr. ACKLEN. To-morrow is Washington's birthday.

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. ACKLEN. I hope you are not going back on the father of your country in that way. [Laughter.]

The motion of Mr. ACKLEN was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. BLOUNT, that the House adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 93, noes 35.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I call for tellers on the motion to adjourn.

Tellers were not ordered; there being but 18 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of a quorum.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, and Mr. SPRINGER called for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays, and there were 22 in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. That is not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Count the other side.

The negative was counted, there being 129.

The SPEAKER. One-fifth of the members voting have not voted in the affirmative upon the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered there being but 17 in the affirmative; not one-fifth of a quorum.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

The object of the bill is simply to correct a mistake made in the passage of a law at the last session of Congress, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar under the rule.

Mr. BECK. I am directed by the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, to whom was referred the bill (S. land, requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to procure an appropriation for the location and preparation of the Choptank and Delaware Ship-Canal line, and for the survey and location of the Chesapeake Bay and Potomac River tide-water canal line, to report them back with a request that the accompanying written report be printed, and, together with the bill and resolution of the General Assembly of Maryland, be referred to the Committe on Commerce, asking that it be used as an amendment to the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HOAR. I desire the bill to go on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

NATIONAL-BANK RETURNS.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 4572) defining the verification of returns of national banks, to report it favorably and without amendment. As this is a House bill, and merely is to legalize oaths taken by officers of the banks as to their returns when made by a notary public, I ask to have it considered at this time. It is a very brief bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that the oath or affirmation required by section 5211 of the Revised Statutes, verifying the returns made by national banks to the Comptroller of the Currency, when taken before a notary public properly authorized and commissioned by the State in which such notary resides and the bank is located, or any other officer having an official seal, authorized in such State to administer oaths, shall be a sufficient verification as contemplated by that section.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENRY M. SPOFFORD.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am instructed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to report the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate to the legal representatives of the estate of the late Henry M. Spofford, claimant of a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, the salary, or compensation without mileage, he would have been entitled to under the law as a Senator from the 4th day of March, 1877, to the 20th day of August, 1880, inclusive.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made and the resolution goes over for one day.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will state to the Senate that the resolution is unanimously reported. It is in the form and is exactly the rule adopted by the Senate in the Corbin case. The committee have all agreed to this resolution and have directed me to ask for its present consideration. I hope, therefore, the Senator will not object.

Mr. INGALLS. I feel called upon to object. Let the resolution lie over until to-morrow. There will be no difficulty about it lying over until to-morrow, and if it is in accordance with the precedents, then of course it can be acted upon.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It is precisely the rule adopted by the Senate in the Corbin case, which was a case pari passu with this.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. That rule has always heretofore been followed by the Senate, except in the case of Segar, of Virginia.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Precisely the rule that has been followed, except in that case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is not before the Senate.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator from Kansas does not withdraw his objection?

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to examine the resolution.

Mr. INGALLS subsequently said: A short time since I objected to the consideration of a resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which I call the attention of the Senator from Georgia. The objection that I had was that the resolution provided for the payment of salary to a person whom I do not believe to be entitled to salary. I have since seen the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] and he states to me that his understanding is that this claimant is to have an amount equal to the salary to which he would have been entitled if a Senator. I believe the precedent is a vicious one, and that the language, at least, of the resolution should be so changed as to show the amount of money that he is to receive, not as salary, for he never was a Senator and consequently could not be entitled to salary, but the compensation that he is to receive for the period named in the resolution. If it can be changed so as to strike out the word "salary," I am perfectly willing that the resolution shall now be acted upon.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am willing to strike out the word "salary" and insert "compensation" if the resolution can be properly guarded. I simply put in the word "salary" to exclude the idea of mileage. What the committee agreed on was that he should not have mileage. I was afraid if we said "compensation to which he would be entitled as a Senator," it might be construed to include mileage. Therefore, I used the word "salary," and in addition inserted the words "without mileage." The object is to make the resolution specific in order to avoid the very conclusion which the Senator wishes to avoid.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution is not before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senate will consent, as the matter has been up already, to bring it before the Senate now, which would save bringing it up again hereafter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the resolution being again considered?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to the consideration of anything in the morning hour but the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. This is a privileged matter. I desire to say to the Senator that the matter having got about three-quarters through, it being a three-minute matter, perhaps it would save time for the morning hour, as this is morning-hour business, to consider it now. It is a resolution of the Senate alone.

Mr. COCKRELL. If it will not consume the morning hour, I have no objection, but if we are to have speeches made on it through the entire morning hour I shall object. I will withdraw the objection for the present and see if the resolution can be disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The objection is withdrawn, and the resolution is again before the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I desire simply to suggest to the Senator from Georgia to amend the resolution by saying "a sum equal to the compensation or salary of a Senator" for such a time.

Mr. LOGAN. Without mileage.

Mr. HOAR. Without mileage. The words "without mileage" are in the resolution.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator can be permitted to withdraw the resolution and present it again so modified, I have no doubt it will meet assent. It is a mere question of phraseology.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection; and the resolution is withdrawn for the present.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia, subsequently said: There is no objection now to the resolution. We have agreed upon the language satisfactorily.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate to the legal representatives of the estate of the late Henry M. Spofford, contestant of a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, a sum equal to the compensation, without mileage, of a Senator from the 4th day of March, 1877, to the 20th day of August, 1880, inclusive.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Are there amendments to the resolution as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave to say a word upon the resolution, which I think I ought to do. I am in favor of a rule which shall allow contestants only their actual expenses, including a compensation to them when they act as their own counsel for the labor actually expended by them in contesting the seat. The Senate in the Segar case and in one of the Alabama cases adopted that principle, and my purpose first was to refuse my assent to this resolution without making any objection to it in debate; but in the Corbin case the Senate went back to its old custom of allowing the salary. My honorable friend from Georgia with great force made the suggestion to me that as the Corbin case and the Spofford case came up at the same time, were cases of the same character, the only distinction between them so far as this matter is concerned being that Mr. Spofford had had the report in his favor of a majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections of this body, it would be very ungracious and very improper to say that the republican contestant should have the salary and the democratic contestant be cut down to his actual expenses, especially when he is dead and could not furnish any estimate of those.

So I am clearly of the opinion that I ought to concur readily in this resolution as it is presented, and I reserve to myself the right to insist upon the obligations of the rule hereafter, and on the payment in future cases to contestants of only their actual expenses.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I concur with every word the Senator from Massachusetts has said; and I am glad he has made the remarks he has submitted. I agree with him that the rule to be established ought to be one of expenses; but as the Senate adopted a different rule in a similar case, as the Senator has mentioned, in the case of Mr. Corbin, every member of the committee, republican and democrat, agreed that we ought to treat these gentlemen precisely alike; and I am glad to say we have done so. I think it is proper we should do that. I simply want to add my remarks in confirmation of what the Senator from Massachusetts has said, and to say that hereafter I will concur with him as to what ought to be the rule.

The resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BANK TAXES.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1945) to repeal all laws which impose taxes on the capital of, and deposits with, banks and bankers, and on bank-checks, and so forth, to report it with an amendment, and I ask to have it read and considered at once.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment reported by the Committee on Finance is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and in lieu thereof to insert:

That so much of sections 3408 and 5214 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as impose taxes upon the deposits of any person, bank, banking association, company, or corporation engaged in banking be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that all the substitute there is?

Mr. BAYARD. That is all.

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not repeal the two-cent stamp tax on bank-checks?

Mr. BAYARD. There is no provision except simply to repeal the tax on deposits.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to repeal taxes on deposits with banks, banking associations, and bankers."

CENSUS REPORTS.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report a joint resolution which is the result of an application made to that committee by the Chief of the Census Bureau, and I ask that it may be immediately considered.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 165) for the printing and distributing special reports relating to the tenth census was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the printing of 50,000 copies of the report on population according to the tenth census, and 5,000 copies of each of the reports relating to the wealth, industry, and social condition of the United States, which may under the acts of Congress of March 3, 1879, and April 20, 1880, be printed for publication prior to the meeting of the first regular session of the Forty-seventh Congress, for distribution as follows: Of the report on population, 15,000 for the use of the Senate, 25,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 10,000 to be distributed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior; and of the other reports 1,500 for the use of the Senate, 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 to be distributed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the business of the morning hour concluded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is not yet concluded. It rests at reports of committees.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to ask (and I think it is a matter that is important enough, as it will only take a minute or two and will lead to no discussion) to take up the resolution for the extension of the franking privilege. It is perfectly understood by all what the resolution means, that it gives us the right to frank the communications that go out to our constituents from the Departments. It will take but a moment, and I hope the Senate will let it pass, so that it may go to the House and may become a law at this session.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will first call through the Calendar of morning business. The introduction of bills is next in order.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VOORHEES asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2212) to protect innocent purchasers and users of patented articles; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. VOORHEES. A few days ago I introduced a resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to look into the question treated of in this bill. I now present the bill, and ask its reference to that committee, and I desire the patience of the Senate simply to say that there is hardly a subject within the range of our legislative rights of greater importance to the people than that to which the bill relates, the protection of innocent purchasers from the impositions and frauds constantly practiced upon them; especially now as those frauds are protected by recent decisions of the courts on the subject of patent rights.

I make these remarks for the purpose of especially calling the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary to the necessity of prompt action, and late as the session is I hope they may give the bill their attention.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to say in reply to the Senator from Indiana that there is a bill upon our Calendar which has passed the House upon this identical subject, and I would be very glad of his aid at some time before the close of the session to get it up and have it passed.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am very glad of that information, and I volunteer as an assistant to the Senator from Iowa on any proper occasion. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2213) to repeal so much of section 3385 of Revised Statutes as imposes an export tax on tobacco; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KIRKWOOD asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 2214) donating condemned cannon to the Brooklyn Veteran Union, Brooklyn, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked and, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 166) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents, flags, &c., to the Masons at Louisville, Kentucky; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MARY A. STEECE.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 2547) increasing the pension of Mary A. Steece, widow of Tecumseh Steece, was indefinitely postponed be reconsidered, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions, there being other testimony presented.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BUTLER. On the 17th of this month I submitted an amendment relative to the survey of the Blue Ridge Canal intended to be proposed to the river and harbor bill, and which I asked should be laid on the table that I might call it up for the purpose of submitting some remarks before the bill passed from the hands of the Committee on Commerce. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] may wish to press the appropriation bill which he has in charge.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I was about to ask the Senator from South Carolina whether he preferred to go on now or after the appropriation bill shall be finished. I submit the question to him entirely, and I shall be governed by his decision.

Mr. BUTLER. I have no desire whatever to interfere with the progress of the appropriation bill. If it will be agreeable to the Senate, at the conclusion of the pending appropriation bill, I should like to submit a few remarks—not more than ten minutes, I think—upon the amendment, which I desire to go to the Committee on Commerce before the river and harbor bill passes out of its hands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks permission at the conclusion of the pending appropriation bill that he be indulged in making some remarks upon the amendment to be proposed by him to the river and harbor bill. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there further business for the morning hour? The Chair hears none, and the business of the morning hour is concluded, and the pending order is the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask that by unanimous consent the pending and prior orders, which may be the cattle bill or the Library bill, I know not which, be laid aside for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. TELLER. I object to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I move that the pending and prior orders be postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia moves that the pending order, being the Calendar of General Orders under the standing order of the day, be postponed for the purpose indicated by him.

Mr. TELLER. There is not any trouble about this or any other appropriation bill. The appropriation bills can and will be passed without any difficulty. We have got along with them as rapidly as anybody could expect we should. There are other matters which are just as deserving of the consideration of the Senate as the appropriation bill now presented, or any other appropriation bill. The committees have been at work all this winter, some committees, at least, making reports and putting them on the Calendar, and now we are shoved out every day by something in the morning hour. The result will be when we adjourn that our work will go for nothing; and upon the Calendar are at least forty or fifty bills which came from the House, which are uncontested and unquestioned, and ought to be passed, but which will not be passed either because every day somebody gets up to make a speech during the morning hour upon some subject which is of no practical importance or interest to the Senate, or because some bill like this is pushed in in place of the Calendar.

Now, if we do not go to the Calendar and stay by the Calendar a little portion of the time, we might as well pass the appropriation bills and quit.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, there is upon the Calendar a joint resolution providing for the erection of a monument to mark the birthplace of George Washington; and as this is his birthday I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up that joint resolution and pass it to-day. It is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 315) amending and re-enacting joint resolution approved June 14, 1879, directing a monument to mark the birthplace of George Washington.

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall be compelled to object to the present consideration of that until we have completed this monument down here to his services and his record to this great country. I think we shall show our gratitude a great deal better by completing that monument than we shall by going back and hunting up his birthplace.

Mr. JOHNSTON. We are at work on that monument, but we cannot complete it in a day. I hope there will be no objection to my request. I hope the Senator from Missouri will consent to let the resolution be acted on. I appeal to the Senator to do that.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are a large number of cases on the Calendar which have come from the House. There is not a day but what the Senator from Virginia and other Senators are coming to me to know what has been done with their cases which have been passed by the House and have been referred to the Committee on Claims. That committee has worked faithfully and industriously, has reported them back, and placed them on the Calendar. Gentlemen are trying to hold us responsible that we do not secure their passage, and yet every one of them here in the morning hour is calling up special cases, consuming the entire morning hour and preventing the consideration of other just as meritorious cases.

Now, Mr. President, there is but one way of transacting the business of the Senate, and that is to go to the Calendar and attend to the business in its regular order. There is in another legislative branch a calendar of one hundred pages of unfinished business; we have here in the Senate a calendar of thirty-three pages of unfinished business. One thousand and fifty-eight cases have been reported to the Senate, and scarcely any of them have been disposed of; and it is because we have been violating every business rule during this entire session. We have not adhered three days to a business mode of conducting the business of the Senate. I am astonished that my good friend from Virginia, one of the oldest Senators here, should want us to tamper with the rules and prevent the disposition of business upon the Calendar.

Mr. LOGAN. I think the Senator from Missouri has taken up more time than anybody else.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am surprised, Mr. President, when a proposition is made here to pass a resolution providing for marking the birthplace of the Father of his Country, that the Senator from Missouri rises up in his place and consumes more time in discussing that proposition than would be required to pass the resolution. When a proposition is made here to make a small appropriation to mark the birthplace of him who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," the Senator from Missouri who enjoys the benefits of that man's labors, who enjoys the liberty which he fought to achieve, rises in his place and gravely makes an objection to a proposition of that character. I will not appeal as the Senator from Virginia does to the Senator from Missouri; but I demand in the name of the American people that that Senator shall no longer interpose to prevent an act of gratitude to the man who has honored this country and whom this country must not fail to do honor to.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia has moved to postpone the pending order in order to take up the joint resolution indicated by him.

Mr. HARRIS. I was not aware that the Senator from Virginia had made the motion. I thought he had asked unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He did ask unanimous consent, and objection was made.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I again ask unanimous consent, and I hope it will be granted.

Mr. COCKRELL. And I again object.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Then I move to lay aside all orders——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator has not the floor for that purpose unless it is yielded by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask the Senator from West Virginia to yield.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from South Carolina, who was entitled to be heard according to the uniform courtesy of the Senate, gave way for the express purpose of taking up the appropriation bill, and I was surprised that my friend from Colorado should object to that. The Senator from South Carolina had the floor for the purpose of making some remarks, and he said he would yield to the appropriation bill, and as soon as it be finished he will ask for the floor. I believe since I have been in the Senate, which is longer than a majority of the Senators have been here, the right of a Senator when he asks to address the Senate has not been denied.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. For an explanation.

Mr. TELLER. I was not aware that anybody desired to address the Senate. My remarks were made upon the motion of the Senator to take up the appropriation bill. If anybody desired to address the Senate he ought not to have made that motion. I certainly would not have interfered with the Senator from South Carolina if I had known he wanted to address the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from Colorado did not interfere with me. I gave way to the Senator from West Virginia in order that he might go on with the appropriation bill. I had no idea that in doing that I should raise such a storm about General Washington. If I had, I should have claimed the floor myself.

Mr. JOHNSTON. In order to save time I hope the Senator will yield and that this resolution will be taken up.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the Senator from Missouri will withdraw his opposition to that. It is the 22d of February.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I make one more appeal——

Mr. SAUNDERS. If the Senator from South Carolina is prepared to address the Senate now, he ought to have the opportunity.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia withdraw his motion?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do, for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Virginia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator cannot withdraw the motion conditionally.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I move that the pending order be postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia moves that the pending order, being the consideration of the Calendar of General Orders under the standing order of the day, be postponed for the purpose indicated by him, and the question is on the motion to postpone.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 34, noes 5.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on taking up the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

MONUMENT AT BIRTHPLACE OF WASHINGTON.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 315) amending and re-enacting joint resolution, approved June 14, 1879, directing a monument to mark the birthplace of George Washington. It proposes to amend and re-enact the joint resolution of June 14, 1879, so as to read:

That the sum of $30,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of erecting a monument at and to mark the birthplace of George Washington, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, who shall have the management and control of the erection of said monument; provided no part of the sum hereby appropriated shall be expended until the Secretary of State shall be satisfied with the title to the land to be occupied by the monument and the securement of a public right of way thereto.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for the reading of the joint resolution of June 14, 1879.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I send up a copy of that resolution.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution directing a monument to be erected to mark the birthplace of George Washington.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $3,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of erecting a monument at and to mark the birthplace of George Washington, which said sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, who shall have the management and control of the erection of said monument.

Approved June 14, 1879.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, is it possible that the Senator from Virginia already has a law authorizing the erection of this monument, and that the distinguished and patriotic Senator from Delaware was ignorant of that law, and appealed to me in his spectacular, dramatic way to withdraw objection to erecting a monument when there was already a law for it?

Why, Mr. President, what is this? Let us look at it seriously. Here was a law passed in 1879 authorizing the erection of a decent, modest monument to that great and good man, the only kind of a one that he, could he speak from his grave, would recognize or sanction—at a cost of $3,000. Now, to take advantage of the supposed patriotism of the Senate, its gushing sentimentality and loyalty, on the 22d of February a motion is made to do what? Ostensibly to give authority to erect a monument, but really to take out of the Treasury, in the name of the old flag, $30,000. That is the beginning and end of this proceeding in the name of loyalty and the old flag and patriotism. I notice that all these efforts to celebrate past events and erect monuments have back of them a snug appropriation, a large appropriation.

I had forgotten about this $3,000 appropriation and this former resolution until this joint resolution was read. It is simply a question as to whether we shall transcend the law we then made and trample it under foot. We fixed the amount then at $3,000. Shall we go on now and give $30,000, and on the 22d of February next, in the name of loyalty and patriotism and the old flag, give $50,000 more, and if that will not do, then when the 22d of February comes again, give another $50,000?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to say to the Senator from Missouri that I was not ignorant of the fact, nor had I forgotten that such a resolution was passed; and I was further informed of the fact which perhaps he was not informed of, that the Secretary of State, who was intrusted with the management of this fund for the purpose indicated in the resolution, had stated to the Senator from Virginia that it was utterly impossible with the amount appropriated to do what was right and proper to be done in the matter, and this resolution is now brought in to carry out the purpose of the original resolution with an appropriation sufficient to accomplish the purpose. So I was not ignorant of the existence of that resolution which the Senator from Missouri had forgotten; and I have been acting upon the information which I received from the Secretary of State that the amount appropriated was wholly insufficient and that it was necessary to make an appropriation of this kind if anything at all was to be done.

Mr. LOGAN. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the Senator from Delaware when he spoke on this measure before, and I rise now merely to make a suggestion to him that he correct his quotation for the RECORD. I believe he said that George Washington, the father of his country, was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." I believe that was the quotation. I think he ought to correct it in this way: "first in war, first in peace, the last one to get a monument."

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I of course sympathize profoundly with the object of this measure; but I have some curiosity to know why the people of Virginia, if they feel a profound interest in this matter, do not erect the monument provided for in the resolution of June 14, 1879. I should like to hear from the Senator from Virginia on that subject.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It was not made the duty of the people of Virginia to erect that monument, but the duty of the Secretary of State.

Mr. INGALLS. Why did he not do it?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Because the sum appropriated was not sufficient.

Mr. INGALLS. That is, the sum of $3,000 was not sufficient to erect a $3,000 monument?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Not a suitable monument for the occasion; for the man and for his acts.

Mr. INGALLS. He differed with Congress in that particular. That is all. Are there no communications on file, Mr. President, from the Secretary of State about this matter? If there are, I should like to have them read.

Mr. JOHNSTON. There are none that I know of. I have had personal interviews with the Secretary of State on the subject, and he asked me to have the resolution taken up and passed, and he has done so on the assurance that $3,000 was not sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. INGALLS. What is it proposed to do with this $30,000?

Mr. JOHNSTON. To erect a monument; I do not know of what sort.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, is there any written or printed report with this joint resolution?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, sir; not that I know of.

Mr. CONKLING. Well, I think I shall venture to say that considering the amount of money appropriated originally and the simplicity of the thing to be done, this has been a very stately and impressive proceeding from the beginning. To plain people there has been something crushing in the magnificence and vastness with which somebody has gone or pretended to go to the place indicated in order that a monument might be stationed there to mark the spot. I think it would be well to have some committee understand this and make a report which the rest of us may understand, before any such sum of money as this is devoted to any purpose so vague.

Mr. President, is it still within the power of a single member of the Senate to object to this joint resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CONKLING. If it is, I should like to take the responsibility of making that objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. One objection will not carry it over. It was taken up on motion.

Mr. CONKLING. I was not in at the moment it was called up. Although I have all the sympathy that I have heard other Senators disclose for a purpose so patriotic, so historic, I might say so sacred as this, nevertheless I would like to take the responsibility alone of objecting to a bill that is a part of a proceeding which I deem so hollow and pretentious.

Mr. President, what is the question before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Are there any amendments in Committee of the Whole to the joint resolution? It is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, for amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. I have none.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand the history of this transaction to be about this: In 1879 Congress, at the request of the Representatives from Virginia, appropriated some three thousand dollars for the purpose of placing a memorial-stone to designate the birthplace of George Washington.

Mr. COCKRELL I will read the resolution if the Senator wishes.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be glad to hear it.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is as follows:

Joint resolution directing a monument to be erected to mark the birthplace of George Washington.

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the sum of $3,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of erecting a monument at, and to mark, the birthplace of George Washington, which said sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of State, who shall have the management and control of the erection of said monument.

Approved June 14, 1879.

Mr. INGALLS. That resolution was passed by both Houses of Congress and approved by the President, and the money was at the disposal of the Secretary of State, to be expended in the manner provided by the resolution. He then, in company with a well-known sculptor, visited the birthplace of Washington. It is, if I am informed correctly, in an old worn-out corn-field on a practically abandoned farm in Virginia, near tide-water, off from the routes of travel, and not accessible except a special pilgrimage is made to visit it. The Secretary of State and this sculptor concluded that under all the circumstances it would not be advisable to carry out the will of Congress, and the sculptor submitted to the Secretary of State a device for a beautifully decorated bronze cottage, with plate-glass windows, to contain various suitable inscriptions; and they proceeded to veto the act of Congress, declared that they would not carry it into effect, and submitted a report to Congress stating that it would be advisable, instead of putting this stone to mark the place, that the cottage or bird-cage to which I have heretofore referred should be substituted in its place, and that they would ask Congress to appropriate $30,000 for that purpose.

Now, Mr. President, if the Congress of the United States desire to have their deliberately expressed purpose nullified and vetoed and abrogated by the servant who is to carry out their wishes, I certainly have personally no objection to the enterprise; but I think that, inasmuch as that original resolution stands ineffectual and incomplete, it would be very much better for us to say to the Secretary of State that we prefer that that design should be carried out, and to let this resolution rest. Certainly if nothing more is done, we should be advised what is to be accomplished by this proposed amendment and the expenditure of this $27,000 additional of money.

A more hollow, pretentious piece of affectation and mockery I think I have never known. If the will of Congress had been carried out, the birthplace of Washington would long since have been properly designated by the monument which was declared to be appropriate by act of Congress.

I have great veneration for the memory of Washington, but I think he has been specially unfortunate in the efforts that have been made to commemorate his services and his career. The incomplete shaft that still stands on the Mall as the ineffectual accomplishment of the American people in that direction has been a conspicuous illustration of the fact to which I have called attention. After standing there for some thirty years a mere fragment, we appropriated a vast sum of money to improve and strengthen the foundations, and I suppose if we appropriate $30,000 to build this brass cottage we shall next session have an appropriation asked for to strengthen the foundations and otherwise to improve and render it appropriate and satisfactory.

I think the Senator from Virginia would do well to have the birthplace of Washington marked by a monolith, for which the original appropriation would be eminently satisfactory and sufficient. I am somewhat surprised that he should take advantage of the supposed patriotism which ought to be evolved on this day, to ask Congress to do a thing that is so out of propriety, in my judgment, and so entirely at variance with what has heretofore been expressed as the will of Congress on this subject.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, this is a thing to be done or not to be done, not to be argued about. If the Senator from Kansas thinks I have any improper motive in this matter he is very much mistaken. You can mark the birthplace by putting up a post if you please, but I think the nation feels differently in regard to it. A three-thousand dollar monument would certainly be very insufficient for the purpose. The amount asked for is $30,000, and I trust the Senate will pass the resolution without any further discussion in regard to it.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator whether he understands, as the Senator from Kansas does, the kind of architecture or fire-works or confectionery which this is to build?

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not know; but I do not think Congress has undertaken to prescribe the form and shape of any monument which it has ordered. It passes the appropriation and trusts that to the proper authorities. In this case we leave it to the Secretary of State. I have no idea what sort of a monument will be put there. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. INGALLS. There was at one time on the files of the Senate, and I either read or heard read by somebody, a description of the structure or fabric that is proposed to be erected in this old corn-field. I have heard it recently designated as a sort of bronze mosque or a brass pagoda, which I am sure that Congress, if it could see the design of or could hear the description of, would reject with indignation and scorn. The severe simplicity and the symmetry of the character of Washington would repel the idea of his birthplace being designated by any such extraordinary phenomenon as this which was described in the document to which I have referred; and if the Senator from Virginia thinks that $3,000 would not suffice to purchase a stone of sufficient dimensions on which to inscribe the fact that here was the birthplace of George Washington, he differs with me in his estimate of what the intention of Congress was when they made the original appropriation.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have not seen the report referred to by the Senator, and do not know anything about it, and never heard of it until to-day. I think the birthplace of Washington ought to be marked in an appropriate way. I am willing to leave the matter to the Senate without any discussion. It is a matter of taste and somewhat of feeling, not of argument.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I see that this resolution provides for acquiring title to land. Ought we not to have an appropriation to provide for a guard, and to build a guard-house for taking care of it?

Mr. JOHNSTON. That is not a matter to be considered now.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator has answered very correctly, not now, but after awhile. This is precisely where it is leading to. When this monument is erected, it will be so grand and beautiful and imposing that there will have to be additional expenditures to build a house for a guard around it, and it will be an annual expense of from $1,500 to $3,000 a year, and then our tax-paying descendants will point back to the Forty-sixth Congress with great pride as the monumental Congress that erected monuments over Washington, not only over his remains to mark them, but to go to hunting up his birthplace in some lost wilderness, and then over Jefferson, and then the Yorktown Centennial jubilee and jollification, and then three or four others which have been neglected so long by the unpatriotic people of this country until the Forty-sixth Congress.

Now, Mr. President, I am opposed to this matter entirely, and it is not right that it should be attempted to be thrust down the throat of the Senate on the 22d day of February, and to place any Senator who opposes it in the position of being unpatriotic and disloyal. I do not propose to have my patriotism and loyalty judged by my votes on such jobs as this. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. TELLER. I move that this resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with directions when they report the same that they report it with a plan for marking this place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado moves that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with instructions when the same shall be again reported to report a plan.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire if this resolution came originally from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. JOHNSTON. It was reported from that very committee unanimously.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution came from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado to recommit.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 21——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I did not understand that this resolution had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. That being the case, I ask the Senator from Vermont, who is a member of that committee I believe, to state what is intended to be done with this money.

Mr. MORRILL. It has never been before the committee at all that I am aware of.

Mr. INGALLS. Then the Senator from Virginia is mistaken about it.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Calendar on page 19, as the Senator will find, shows that the joint resolution was "reported June 9, 1880, by Mr. JONES, of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds without amendment."

Mr. MORRILL. I may say for myself that I never heard of the resolution in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It may have been considered there, but so far as I know anything about it, it was never presented at any meeting when I was present.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts—who was also a member of that committee—if he ever heard anything about it?

Mr. DAWES. I never heard of it in committee. It is due to the Senator from Virginia that I should say that the Senator consulted me yesterday in my seat in reference to it. I do not recollect ever having heard of it in committee.

Mr. CONKLING. When was the report made, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. June 9, 1880.

Mr. CONKLING. A conference of Senators yesterday does not furnish any foundation for a report.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The record, which is supposed to be verity, shows that the joint resolution was reported by the chairman of that committee from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Now, in reference to whether it is to cost $30,000, or $10,000, or $5,000, or $3,000 to erect a proper monument, I do not know; but Congress has expressed its confidence in the discretion of the Secretary of State and intrusted him with the control of that matter. He has informed the Senator from Virginia that the sum heretofore appropriated is insufficient, and at his request the Senator from Virginia has brought forward this resolution.

The Secretary of State has never been an especial favorite of mine; but I apprehend his high character in this country entitles him to such confidence as will enable him to be intrusted with the expenditure of $30,000 without having details and plans presented to the Senate as to how he shall expend it. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to leave this matter with the Secretary of State. If in his judgment it requires $30,000 to erect a proper monument, so be it. I do not desire to be so critical as to impose conditions on the Secretary of State, a man who stands in this country the equal at least of any Senator on this floor in his position. Knowing nothing personally about him, knowing him only through his office, I think we may safely lodge in his hands the expenditure of the money which we choose to appropriate for this purpose. The Senator from Virginia assures the Senate that he has had personal interviews with the Secretary of State; and although there are no written communications from that officer on the subject, I think none of us can question the truth of what has been said by the Senator from Virginia, that he has the assurance of the Secretary of State after a personal examination of the matter that a suitable monument cannot be erected for the sum indicated in the resolution of 1879. It is for that reason that I vote for this resolution; because I am assured by the Senator from Virginia that the Secretary of State has told him personally that the amount at first appropriated was wholly insufficient, and that it required the appropriation now asked to erect a proper monument.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I think I shall vote as cheerfully as any member of this body the most liberal sum to be appropriately expended in such a monument to Washington as shall be, on careful examination and report to this body, found proper and becoming; but however liberal I may be disposed to be, I am not willing to vote for this resolution in its present form. I am not to be driven from my opposition by the occasion, by the day, nor by what we owe to the Father of his Country.

I ask any Senator to tell me what monument of any note has ever been erected in this country until designs have first been provided so that those who voted the appropriation might know what they were doing. If I mistake not, we gave large sums for a design for the column, the monument to Washington now being erected in this city. It was started by private contributions; but we have appropriated one or two hundred thousand dollars more from the Treasury, and I repeat that in all such cases we have designs showing what is to be done.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion? I understood him to say that it was the universal custom of Congress not to make appropriations until plans for monuments had been made.

Mr. HAMLIN. So far as I know, they have called for designs from architects to know for what purpose they were voting.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think the Senator is wholly mistaken about that. That has never been the custom. We have appropriated a sum of money for a monument or statue and then made the monument or statue afterward. For example, the Yorktown monument Committee itself provided for the appointment of a person to erect that monument.

Mr. HAMLIN. I shall thank the Senator if he will give me the exception to the rule I stated.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I give the exception in regard to the Yorktown monument, where Congress appropriated $100,000 for the construction of the monument, and no single design for it had ever been presented to Congress.

Mr. HAMLIN. One error, if there were one committed there, is no justification for repeating the error here, in my judgment. So far as my knowledge went, I knew we had offered premiums to the architects of the country to furnish designs, and had paid for the one that was accepted, and I think it a wise policy to pursue.

Again, I think we ought to know a little more specifically the point upon which any monument is to be erected, whether it is to be the proper point, and one which would best comport with the circumstances with which it is connected.

Mr. JOHNSTON. George Washington was only born at one place, I would inform the Senator, and that place is as well know as any in the world; it is known historically; it is a well-ascertained, well-known place.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes, but a monument that would tower to the sky in memory of Washington may not be needed there, something perhaps more humble would mark the birthplace of Washington and the monument for the world to see may be at some point in our Union where it will be observed by our own people and by the peoples of other nations. These are all questions that ought to be considered, and as I now understand it there has been no consideration of this matter in committee, at least two of its members have heard nothing of it.

I shall not vote for this appropriation, but I will vote the most liberal appropriation for this object when it is presented here in the proper form.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, this seems to be a very simple matter. On the 14th of June, 1879, Congress passed the joint resolution which has been read appropriating $3,000 to erect a fitting monument at the birthplace of Washington and authorizing the Secretary of State to expend the money. Thereupon the Secretary of State, it is said with one of the most distinguished sculptors alive, Mr. Story, went to the spot and was of opinion that such a monument as Congress would desire could not be erected for the sum appropriated; and within a very short time—it does not appear exactly how long—that opinion was communicated to the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, probably at the assembling of the Senate on the next December, within six months of the passage of the original resolution, and thereupon the committee of this body prepared and reported on the 9th of June, 1880, through its chairman, the pending resolution.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Let me correct the Senator in that respect. The House passed this joint resolution first. This is a House resolution. It has passed the House and passed early in the first session of Congress after the original resolution was passed.

Mr. HOAR. So that within a few months of the passage of the original resolution the House of Representatives expressed its opinion that the sum of $30,000 ought to be expended instead of the sum of $3,000 first provided. Whether that is right or wrong, I do not know; but when the House of Representatives within a few months of the passage of the original resolution of June 14, 1879, affirmed that in their judgment this larger sum ought to be appropriated, and when on the 9th of June, 1880, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, without any indication of its dissent, reported favorably upon the resolution that was standing on our Calendar, it was the duty of any public officer to delay further action on the original resolution until the opinion of Congress should be matured upon that subject.

Now, this joint resolution gives no further authority to the present Secretary of State or to the present administration. The person who will execute this, if it be executed, will be somebody not now holding office under the executive department of the Government, and somebody whom probably the majority of the Senate and whom the majority of the people would be willing to charge with such a matter.

Whether it be expedient to erect on a deserted spot, if it be a deserted spot, a costly monument; whether it be expedient to do anything more than erect such a monolith as the Senator from Kansas has suggested marking permanently the birthplace, I have never investigated; indeed I never heard of the subject until it came up and the Senator from Virginia spoke of it yesterday as a matter he was to bring up to-day. I have no opinion to express on that point; but it does seem to me that whether that proposition be right or wrong, the public officer charged with the execution of the measure acted right, having taken the most distinguished advice in the country which was at his disposal, the advice of Mr. William W. Story. When he suggested his opinion or his doubt, and the House of Representatives within a very few months—what is the date of this resolution passing the House?

Mr. COCKRELL. It passed the House on the 3d of June, 1880.

Mr. HOAR. The 3d of June, 1880. Does it appear when it was introduced into the House?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have sent to ascertain that fact.

Mr. HOAR. At any rate it was within the year. The House of Representatives changed its mind on this subject. I do not know whether my colleague or whether my friend from Vermont was present in the committee when it was considered; but we have the certificate of the chairman of that committee, its official organ, that this was reported by its authority, and it stands on the Senate Calendar ever since the 9th of June, 1880. No man questions that.

Congress will exercise its discretion and judgment in this matter as it sees fit; but it seems to me that there is certainly no occasion for criticism of the course of any executive officer in regard to the matter.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, in one of the orations of an illustrious Englishman, orations which the world will not willingly let die, stand these words:

> It will be the duty of the poet and the historian in all ages to let no occasions pass of commemorating the virtues of this illustrious man; and till time shall be no more will a test of the progress our race has made in wisdom and in virtue be derived from the veneration paid to the immortal name of Washington.

In the spirit of these words I would conduct my action to-day, and therefore I cannot coincide with all which fell from the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL.] I would vote and I will vote to erect on any spot fitly chosen any monument appropriate, not to perpetuate, but to remind the passers-by of the fame, the services, and the example of George Washington. I will so vote on the anniversary of his birth or on any other day when the Senate sits and while still I am honored by permission to sit in the Senate house.

I sympathize, however, heartily with what was said by my friend from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.] One of the observations he made is not unlikely I think to become cherished as a saying. I refer to that observation which disclosed the propriety of a parallel between the character of George Washington and the thing to symbolize that character. Therefore I will not vote for war-paint or feathers to commemorate him; and if the honorable Senator from Kansas is correctly advised, and has given a correct report of the foreshadowing of this work, I venture to think with as much confidence as should belong to one so little taught that few things could be more inappropriate, and inappropriate regardless of its location, still more inappropriate if it is to be put away in seclusion as a lasting monument and mark of that particular spot.

Some Senator observed that this was a very simple matter. So it seemed to me when the matter took place. Its simplicity consisted in the setting up of a stone, the two qualities of which were to be permanence and simplicity. The mere erection of a monument to do a given thing, which was to affix perpetual identity to the spot on which was born the most historic man that ever lived in this hemisphere, was a simple matter; and if it has ceased to be simple, it is for reasons which I do not choose to be drawn into stating. There has been a good deal of what the great master once called "a dreadful note of preparation." There has been a solemnity and a ponderous outgiving of what was to be done preparatory to setting up this simple stone on a spot which the Senator from Virginia tells us is unmistakable. He reminds us that there is but one such spot, and he says that its exact location is undoubted. Despite of that, the proceeding has been somewhat like that which took place when Warren Hastings was tried, and when an English wit said that the Lords walked and the trial stood still. There has been a great deal of passing to and fro, and at last the question is whether the statute before me, which takes hold at the end of two years of unexpended appropriations, can possibly reach this little $3,000 appropriation and cover it into the Treasury after twice a twelvemonth before anything has been done to execute this order. If Congress was wrong originally in a direction to do so simple a thing, that error ought to be corrected.

We are told that the House of Representatives changed its mind. With great deference, I do not know whether it did or not. If the mind of the House of Representatives was changed, whether the House changed it or somebody else changed it is a fair question, and a question which will present itself to all those who know as well as Senators around me know the sort of process to which these plans and intentions of erecting works of art are subjected. Somebody usually in each case comes to take charge, some sculptor or some proposer, and as far as the act giveth it of individual interest, it can do it. The matter usually becomes a thing conducted in a particular direction and for a particular interest.

I beg to say that nothing which has fallen from me or will fall from me is intended to be in derogation of any compliment paid by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to the citizen of that State whose name he has mentioned; a man who not only wrote a textbook in the law which stands in every library, which by most persons is imputed to his illustrious father, but a man who has written poetry which places him in competition certainly with the most illustrious poets of his time, a man who in addition to that has made marble to which I think artists will uncover. A man who has made himself famous in three departments either of which challenges usually the best endeavors of genius, is not to be spoken of lightly by me, nor do I mean to say a word which would require vindication or praise of the distinguished American to whom I have referred.

I read in the papers that he visited this spot. I do not know, nor does anybody seem to know what he proposes to do, or whether he proposes to do anything; but without a suggestion of the character of this work except as far as that suggestion comes from the Senator from Kansas and is of a character which no Senator has reason to defend or to approve, the question is whether we are here in a moment to upset the deliberate action of both Houses of Congress which has stood for nearly two years, as it seems, unexecuted, to play blindman's bluff upon this question by voting $30,000 to make, we know not what. For one, I am against it; and I have ventured to occupy so much of the time of the Senate, because I was unwilling to seem to stand in the attitude either of wanting reverence for a great memory, or of seeming to criticise the genius or the character of a living man, whose name has also been mentioned in connection with this work.

If this resolution may go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with the understanding that that committee acquaint itself with what is proposed, and display that in some form before us, the Senator from Virginia certainly must be sure that no injury can come, and I think he will warrant me in saying that it will be worth something to be indemnified against the species of works of art, so called, which the honorable Senator can see in a good many instances, and see without fatigue even though he pays his visit on foot; I think that honorable Senator would agree with me in saying that in the light of past experience he would like to have all the safeguards he well can that his State is to be embellished and not to be disfigured by anything which is to be put there. And if he will allow this resolution to go to a committee, and if he will take as much trouble as may be necessary to find out what is proposed, and tell us, I promise him not only my vote, but I promise to co-operate with him in taking up at such early time as may be most convenient to him this resolution or a substitute to be reported for it; but I protest that we should not in this way go blindly into a matter which is so easy to be understood and which I think it is so emphatically our business to understand.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I shall be very much disappointed and surprised if the Senator from New York will not vote for this resolution to-day. I appreciate his patriotic motives, and I do not believe he really has any opposition to the resolution. I understand, without knowing whether it is so, that the design, if any has been made, has been made by W. W. Story, and as the Senator from New York has well said, he is the most illustrious of living Americans in the department of general art. He is a poet, he is an artist, he is a sculptor, and I for one, if I knew the fact that he had made the design, would be willing to take it on his fame.

Mr. CONKLING. But the honorable Senator does not even know that fact, as he has twice informed us.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I do not know that of my own knowledge, but I would do in this case as has been done in every other like case. I think the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] is mistaken in regard to what has been done. As far as my observation has gone, we make the appropriation trusting either to the Secretary of War or to the Secretary of State, or to some commission, to make the design afterwards. I know that was so in the case of the Yorktown monument, and I am informed by the Senator from South Carolina that it was done in the case of the Cowpens monument. I know it was done in the case of Saratoga. I know at the last session of Congress a monument was authorized in the Senator's own State of New York, in which there was no suggestion as to any plan, but it was left——

Mr. CONKLING. Which monument was that?

Mr. JOHNSTON. The monument to General Herkimer.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think not, sir. I think if the honorable Senator will look back to the act of last session——

Mr. CONKLING. I do not need to look back about the monument to Nicholas Herkimer.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Congress voted that without having any idea, so far as I know, of what the monument was to be.

Mr. CONKLING. Oh no.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I think the practice of Congress has been exactly the reverse of what the Senator from Maine stated it to be. I trust the Senate will act on this resolution now. It has been here nearly a year, and no Senator has questioned the validity of the report. Senators say they were not present in the committee; but we have the authority of the chairman of the committee for saying that the resolution was reported by the committee, and it would be a new thing indeed in the history of the Senate if the authority of our committees or a portion of the committee, which has been standing nearly a year on our Calendar, should be disputed in this irregular and one-sided way.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. JOHNSTON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I am reminded of a thing I meant to say that, for one, nothing is further from my thoughts than to challenge an act or intention of the honorable Senator from Florida now absent, and absent on a very sad errand, in making this report; but the Senate will observe here comes a bill reported without any written or printed report whatever, reported some time ago, reported from a committee two members at least of which have said not only that it never was before the committee when they were there, but one of them that he never heard of it until yesterday when some Senator asked him to confer in regard to it.

Now, without challenging at all the act of the Senator from Florida, the Senator from Virginia must see that in this instance this report had very much less, it must have had very much less consideration than ordinarily occurs in the case of any matter of moment sent to a committee, and no doubt the fact was that some person interested about this, who had followed it through the House, came to the chairman of the committee who in some sort took it for granted, it being the House resolution and probably without knowing much if anything about it, that it was an ungracious thing to object to a patriotic purpose, one that we all concur in, and, therefore, in what Mr. Sumner used to be fond of saying, a perfunctory way this report was made. But when you come to how much it means by way of instruction to the Senate, that is a fair question for consideration without reflecting at all upon any member of the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. I think it is due to the Senator from Virginia, after the allusions made to me, as I have said that I never heard of the joint resolution till yesterday, to state that I have not been able to attend the meetings of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds so frequently as I ought to have done, and the fact that this resolution came from the committee without my notice is not a matter of any remark and would not be to the other members of the committee, who have known how my duties have called me to other committees on the very day on which this committee has its sessions. An important committee upon which I am a member holds its sessions on the very day. The Senator from Virginia, however, came to me yesterday with this resolution, which he told me had been reported from the committee, and gave me notice that he was going to call it up, and asked me if I would not co-operate with him, and I cheerfully said I would. It is due to him that I should say that the fact that I did not know of its being in committee is no reflection upon the action of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The Senator from Florida who is chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds not being in his seat, I mentioned the subject to the Senator from Massachusetts, a member of the committee, and gave him notice that I was going to call up the matter to-day.

Mr. MORRILL. It is perhaps due from me to say that while I do not recollect ever having had my attention called to this joint resolution, it is possible that the chairman might have called my attention to it, it is so long ago, but it has entirely escaped my memory. I am very sure it was never discussed and considered in the committee when I was present.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to prolong this debate; but I desire to make one observation in regard to the matter. It does seem to me that the safest way to have a public monument of this character constructed is to do what this resolution does, submit it to the discretion and the responsibility of some public officer of high character and rank, as the Secretary of State, instead of insisting that Congress shall deal with the question of the plan itself. There are gentlemen in this body and in the other House who possess great taste, great acquaintance with works of art, and great capacity for such a service; and there are other gentlemen, of whom I am one, who possess few, if any, of these qualities. I think there is no instance of a national monument erected under the authority of the National Government which has not been pretty creditable as a work of art on the whole. And without thinking that it is quite a fair argument, it is proper to observe that the only works of art for which Congress in its collective capacity and by its collective taste, and nobody else, is responsible, are the cenotaphs in the Congressional burying-ground, which add a new terror to death. So that it seems to me for one that I can better trust this duty to the responsibility and the capacity of the gentleman likely to be Secretary of State, before this resolution becomes a law, than to trust it to my own.

I only speak for myself; but it seems to me that when within four or five months after the original resolution passed, so distinguished a sculptor as Mr. Story is understood to have thought the sum inadequate, and thereupon the House of Representatives provided for an increase, there is sufficient ground for this measure. It was introduced immediately when the House met, though I have not verified that, but within six months after the original passage and certainly within twelve months, the House passed a resolution to amend and re-enact the old resolve; and under those circumstances it was proper that the Executive Department should await the decision of the Senate, and not proceed after that to execute the original resolution.

In regard to the suggestion of my honorable friend from Kansas, whose tastes and accomplishments no man rates more highly than I do, on the propriety of a house, I am not quite sure that he is right, speaking as a person with a very little right to speak in that observation. Among the most touching memorials on earth are the dwelling house of Shakspeare and the dwelling house of Burns, which are their monuments at their birthplaces. It is true that those houses have the association of being the real places where the birth took place, and also they are places in which the memorials of the person are collected, the clothing worn in childhood, the family Bible of the parents, the autographs, the portraits of kindred, little articles of furniture that surrounded the childhood of the person to be commemorated; and I am not prepared to say that a cottage of handsome shape, such as Mr. Story would design, and of enduring material, filled with memorials gathered from the region round about Washington's birthplace and of the generation to which that childhood belonged, is not the fittest monument that could be placed upon that spot. The soldiers of my own State in a great number of our towns have preferred a memorial hall which should be filled with such memorials, and just such associations, to any form of monumental structure, whatever artist might design it or however it might pierce the sky in its loftiness and in its beauty. And therefore without undertaking to assume that I am fit to make this choice myself, I desire to suggest to my honorable friend from Kansas that it is possible that the design which he has so ridiculed, may have something in it to commend it to the taste and to the sympathy of future generations as the fittest memorial of Washington and of the father and the mother of Washington to be erected on the place where he was born.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, it is with no unbecoming pride that at the close of this extraordinary discussion in which has been developed the fact that neither has Virginia nor the United States completed any fitting memorial to commemorate the virtues of the Father of his Country, I rise to say that my own State, so closely and historically connected with that great man, nearly half a century ago erected in my native city that splendid marble shaft which now so beautifully typifies the severe simplicity and purity of the character of the peerless Washington. I should receive universal condemnation from my people if I withheld my support from this resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, yesterday evening the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. BURNSIDE] seemed to think the Senate would adjourn over to-day in observance of the fact that it was the birthday of George Washington. The Senate being involved in public business of a very pressing character declined to do that, and this morning the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON,] thinking it was an appropriate day on which to give some expression of our sentiments of gratitude toward that great character, moved this resolution in the Senate, and he was met with the objection of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] who is so greatly devoted to the progress of the public business, and who seems to find in the fact that the resolution was taken up out of its order a sufficient reason for making a severe objection to its consideration. Nevertheless, it has been now a long time before the Senate. The Senator from Missouri also seemed to be apprehensive that there was to be a wasteful or extravagant expenditure of the public money in the passage of this measure; but when the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] took the floor he made objection that the State of Virginia had not erected this monument, that the State of Virginia had been so ungrateful to her great son as not to have marked the place of his birth, but that that place was allowed to go to waste and the old field unmarked and unappreciated. Reflections upon the State of Virginia under circumstances of this kind are not worthy to be made; they are not justified by the history of this transaction; for while Virginia loved Washington as much as any State could love her son, and has always prided in his memory as much as the human heart was capable of taking pride in the glories of any individual, she has not assumed to herself the right to usurp that which belonged exclusively to the nation, the duty and the honor of marking the birthplace of this greatest citizen.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to remind him that the most beautiful monument of Washington in existence is the Crawford statue at Richmond.

Mr. MORGAN. Virginia has not been wanting in her fidelity to Washington's character and fame, but she has allowed the United States Government to take charge of the duty of marking his birthplace. Almost immediately after the organization of the present Government a law was enacted bestowing the pitiful sum of $3,000 upon that holy duty. It was a small sum then, Mr. President, but doubtless it seemed considerable because of the poverty of our country, but since that time we have grown from three millions to fifty millions of people, and a proportionate increase of the sum of money it is proposed to bestow upon this place is not by any means out of keeping with the growth and increase of our prosperity. It is hard to my mind to hear Senators suggest that we are now expending extravagantly $30,000 to commemorate the birthplace of a man like George Washington, when in the very earliest discharge of the debt of gratitude which our nation undertook to express toward him, drawing upon their scant resources and upon a people then overtaxed by the hardships of war, they considered that $3,000 was a sum that they could justly bestow upon this holy work.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask him to refer to the date of that law which gave $3,000?

Mr. MORGAN. The resolution, as I understand, for the commemoration of the place of his birth passed the Congress of the United States at a very early day in 1789.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to see it. It is not 1789, I remind the Senator from Alabama, but 1879, in the Forty-fifth Congress, and then it was $3,000, which was all that was asked for that work.

Mr. MORGAN. If that was so, then I think the Senate and the House of Representatives ought speedily to bestir themselves to rid themselves of the disgrace of having been so parsimonious. The House has done so. Now I regard this not as a monument to George Washington; if I did I should never give my consent to devoting the miserable sum of $30,000 to be expended in that direction; but it is the sacred duty of marking out historically, for the information of those to come, that spot upon which occurred the greatest event in the history of the American continent. It is an affectionate tribute to the character of the man long before he became known in his greatness and in his glory; it is a tribute that marks the gratitude of a people who follow him back to his cradle and who wish to signify every step that he took from his little boyhood up to his glorious manhood. I dare say that in his greatest hours as well as in the days when he was not noted, in the struggles that he made in his early manhood to acquire reputation and to discharge his duty to society, in the pilgrimages which he made across the Alleghany Mountains into the depth of the forest with a surveyor's compass to mark out the unknown boundaries of lands, to survey the country which we have now so beautified and adorned, his heart turned with its very tenderest emotions back to the spot of his birth; and afterward, when he had achieved glory on the field of battle and came before Congress to surrender his commission, after he had stripped himself of the paraphernalia of warfare and accepting again the duties of citizenship, I have no idea that any spot in this world was so dear to his recollection as the place of his birth; and so in later times, when he came to lie down in the presence of the world and expire crowned with every glory that the world could bestow upon him, his tenderest thoughts ran back to the place and the time of his early childhood and his birth.

And so, Mr. President, I wish to follow him, I wish to go back to that point of time which must have been the most sacred in his own recollection, there to erect a monument, simple it may be, but fitting and becoming, the product of the genius of a great American sculptor, which shall mark for all time to come that sacred spot around which all American sentiment should gather and to which it should cling with undying affection and endless gratitude. I cannot conceive how points can be made upon a resolution of this kind that tend toward its disparagement and its defeat when gentlemen reflect that they are not honoring Washington but themselves by giving a mark of their gratitude to him in this particular.

It is said that the resolution has not been properly considered in committee, and in answer to that the response is that all the committee who were present voted for it. The House of Representatives had first considered it and afterward the committee of the Senate. It was referred to that committee June 3, 1880, and has been reported back to the Senate. Is there anything in this measure of such extravagant expenditure or of such vast public importance with reference to the manner of expending this money as that it should have been attended with an elaborate report as to the manner in which the expense must be made? Is there any reason why the Senate of the United States should halt or hesitate in regard to this resolution when the duty of building this monument and the sum appropriated for it is confided to the highest officer of state in the Government? If a plan had been drawn or designs had been submitted, printed, and engraved, and laid before the Senate of the United States, they would have attracted only a passing observation from Senators, and we should not have known at the time we came to pass the resolution whether one plan or the other was the better.

Sir, we have followed the course in this case that we have followed in almost every question of the kind, and that much I am glad to hear the Senator from Massachusetts commend as being the most appropriate and the safest plan to observe in the erection of such a monument as this. We confide it to the Secretary of State, knowing from his character, whoever he may be, that he will not inflict upon Virginia or upon the United States a monument unworthy of the great character whose birthplace we intend to mark.

It seems to me, with all deference to the opinions of Senators, that this question ought to have been met in a different spirit and we should have passed this joint resolution without one question of its propriety.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PENDLETON in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] to recommit the joint resolution with instructions, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS, (when Mr. HOAR's name was called.) The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and myself are paired on this subject.

Mr. VANCE, (when Mr. RANSOM's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. RANSOM] is engaged in the Committee on Commerce on important business.

The roll-call was concluded and the result announced—yeas 15, nays 35; as follows:

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS, (when Mr. HOAR'S name was called.) The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and myself are paired on this question. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded and the result announced—yeas 40, nays 10; as follows:

So the joint resolution was passed.

The message further announced that the House had set apart next Sunday, February 27, at three o'clock p. m., for the observance of the ceremonies in memory of Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, late a member of this House from the State of New York, and extending an invitation to the Senate to attend in the House at that hour and participate in the ceremonies.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. No. 6719) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 386) for printing report of the Life-Saving Service.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PENDLETON in the chair.) The morning hour has expired, and the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (S. No. 1988) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that the pending order be laid aside for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which was laid aside for the Library bill last night.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator from West Virginia would yield to me for a moment, until I make a statement to the Senate about a bill I desire to call up, I shall be very much obliged.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Of course I will yield for a statement, but I cannot yield for a bill or anything of that kind.

Mr. LOGAN. Has the Senate voted to take up the appropriation bill?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Not yet. I have moved to take it up.

Mr. LOGAN. I intended to get the eye of the Chair prior to the Senator from West Virginia rising from his seat, but I was unfortunate in my attempt. In order to test the sense of the Senate as to whether they intend that anything shall be done this session or not with Senate bill No. 1992, I desire to ask the Senate this morning to take it up, inasmuch as we have done one thing that seems to have been a good and proper thing to do. We have appropriated $30,000 to mark the birthplace of George Washington, which I voted for, and did so because I thought it was right and on the ground that he is the greatest man in history. I think, following that, we ought to do another grateful thing. There is a bill before the Senate that I introduced, doing, as I consider, a very small thing for another man, perhaps equally entitled to credit before this country; a bill merely placing the leader of our armies upon the retired list. I am willing, if any amendment shall be desired to be made to it, to allow the amendment to be tested. It does seem to me as though this country could afford at least a few minutes' time to be expended in taking up this bill and acting on it.

I do not wish to discuss the matter at any length; but we build monuments to the memory of Washington to mark his birthplace, because, as it is said, he was the father of the country in the sense that he was the leader of our army when we were struggling for the liberties of the people, he being the leader of the small army that gave us our liberties. We commemorate his memory, and it lives and dwells in the hearts of the American people. So with the name of the man who led the armies of this great Republic to preserve that liberty that Washington and his followers gained. Some mark of respect should be stamped upon the history of this country in commemoration of the deeds of the second greatest man known in American history, if I may place him so.

It is a small thing I ask, that the Senate may by unanimous consent agree that this bill may be taken up now; and if there is anything in it that is distasteful to Senators let it be stricken out. I only ask action on the bill. I do not desire discussion, unless it is courted by others. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 1992 for present consideration, and I move that the pending orders be laid aside temporarily for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I believe there is already a motion before the Senate made by myself which, I suppose, will have priority. I regret that it is my duty to insist upon proceeding with the appropriation bill. The Senator from Illinois will recollect that yesterday it was under consideration, and at the session last night it was laid aside for the purpose of taking up the Library bill, with the understanding that we should go on with it to-day. I hope the Senator will call up his bill at some other time; but, of course, he is the best judge of that. It will remain with the Senate to decide what to do. It is my duty to insist upon proceeding with the appropriation bill. It has been usual to allow appropriation bills the right of way. As was said by a Senator on the other side of the Chamber the other day, and a very old Senator in service here, it is the unwritten law of the Senate that when an appropriation bill is ready to be considered the Senate shall always proceed with it.

Mr. LOGAN. I only desire to say that I have tried very many times to get this bill up in the Senate. I do not say, nor will I intimate, that there is a desire on the part of any one to postpone it until the session shall expire, but I always find the same objection. I have never made a motion to proceed to its consideration when there was not something presented which was urged to be absolutely necessary to have acted upon. I find that to be the case every day. When a motion is made to appropriate $30,000 to mark the birthplace of the Father of his Country, let us devote ten minutes at least to that which will commemorate the deeds of the savior of his country. I do object to forcing at all times something in the face of this bill. It will not take perhaps ten minutes to act upon it, and I ask that those ten minutes may be given to it now.

I am as much in favor of passing the appropriation bill as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I shall lend my energy, what little it may be, to advance appropriation bills when they are up and to pass them as hastily as it can properly be done; but I do insist that at some time or other this bill should have consideration. It has never had it yet, although I have asked for it time and again. I see that when other bills of much less importance are presented by Senators they can have them taken up and passed. Bills, too, in the same line that this is are taken up and passed; bills in reference to men almost unknown are taken up and passed; bills of various and different characters are taken up and passed; but this bill always finds an obstruction.

If the Senator insists and will not allow me to have a moment to have the bill called up, I shall ask for a vote on the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to lay aside, without losing its place, the Library bill, in order that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. LOGAN. I shall object unless the Senator will agree that the bill I urge shall be considered first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois objects.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Then I move to postpone the pending and all prior orders in order that I may move to take up the appropriation bill.

Mr. LOGAN. To postpone until when?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. To postpone until to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. Before that motion is put allow me to make a suggestion. If the Senate will agree that this bill may be taken up to-morrow morning after the morning hour, and shall be made the special order, I shall interpose no objection whatever to taking up the appropriation bill. I do not suppose my interposing an objection would prevent it from coming up anyhow, but it seems to me that that arrangement would be fair and just.

Mr. VEST. I shall object to any agreement of that sort? As I have said before to-day to the Senator from Illinois, I am opposed to considering the bill he has in charge, and I propose to offer every parliamentary objection I can to it at every opportunity.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator mean to say that he is opposed to considering the bill or that he is opposed to the bill?

Mr. VEST. I propose by every parliamentary proceeding to obstruct its passage.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I wish just a moment, in order to make an explanation. My impression is that there was a tacit understanding when the bill for the relief of General Grant was presented originally and considered somewhat in the Senate, that at an early day it would be taken up and considered. No day was fixed, it is true, but that was the understanding, so far as I comprehended it at that time. I shall vote for the motion, if it be a motion, made by the Senator from Illinois, that a special time be fixed for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. VEST. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey a question? He speaks of a tacit understanding. A tacit understanding by whom?

Mr. RANDOLPH. That was my understanding.

Mr. VEST. There was no such understanding on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I do not know what may have been the understanding of the Senator.

Mr. VEST. I have never heard of such an understanding.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I recollect very well that the Senator from Missouri said then, as he has said to-day, that he would oppose at all times and by every obstacle the consideration or the passage of this bill. That is true; but he did not commit me, nor did he commit some others on this side of the Chamber to such a course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, to postpone the pending and all prior orders.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator if he will allow me to have my motion put first. I desire to move that this bill be made the special order to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is plain that such a motion would lead to a long debate.

Mr. LOGAN. It is not plain.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Missouri has just given notice that it will. I will do anything that one Senator ought to do to another in the way of courtesy toward my friend from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. The mere fact of making it the special order will not lead to debate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I regret very much, but I feel it my duty, in fact it is a duty, to oppose the request of the Senator. I should be glad to agree with him if I could, but it is my duty to push forward the appropriation bill, and I must insist on going on with it.

Mr. FERRY. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois to let the vote be taken on postponing the pending and all prior orders, and then he can take the sense of the Senate on the proposition to take up the bill he proposes. If the motion to postpone the pending orders is agreed to the Senator from Illinois can move to take up the bill which he has in charge.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The object sought to be accomplished by the Senator from Illinois can be attained practically by giving notice that to-morrow morning immediately after the morning hour he will endeavor to take up the bill he has in charge.

Mr. LOGAN. What effect would that have? An objection would put it over just the same as has been the case all the time. I find my difficulty is, and it has been so every time—I may be unfortunate in it—but I never have been recognized yet when I attempted to get this bill up until after some other Senator has had an opportunity to make a motion, and I always fall in just behind another motion. Of course it is my misfortune, but that has been the fact except in one instance. Giving notice amounts to nothing. I have given notice time and again, and it amounted to nothing. I find an objection always in the way, and some other bill takes precedence. That may be a very good way for a bill to be defeated, and it may be unfortunate for me that it occurs so, but I desire a vote this morning as to whether this bill shall have a day in the Senate. I say to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that of course it is very important that the appropriation bill should be passed, and I am willing to assist him. Unfortunately somebody on the Appropriations Committee always stands here ready and is always recognized so as to stand in the way of this bill. I do not mean that it is intentional, but I mean that it is unfortunate for this bill that it is so.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I think my friend is unfortunate this morning in opposing an appropriation bill which has been already partly considered. I hope he will take some other time to press his measure and not get in the way of an appropriation bill hereafter. Now, I hope there will be a vote on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia to postpone the pending and all prior orders in order that he may move to take up the appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Now, I move to proceed to the consideration of——

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia has been recognized.

Mr. LOGAN. I supposed he would be.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move to proceed to the consideration of what is known as the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, which was partly considered yesterday and laid aside last night in order to take up the Library bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I now move that the bill I have mentioned, Senate bill No. 1992, be made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour, and I ask for a vote upon that motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I believe the bill I have charge of has been taken up by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; I understand that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator could hardly get his motion considered unless the Senate votes to lay aside the appropriation bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I supposed from the Senator's remarks that he did not desire to interpose objections to the bill, but wished merely to get the appropriation bill up. Now his bill is up. I merely want the consent of the Senate that I may have for this bill a place on the Calendar for to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Of course the Senator knows that his bill is on the Calendar now. If the Senator will ask for unanimous consent to that arrangement; I will say that for one I shall not object.

Mr. LOGAN. Ask unanimous consent! That is very thin; I understand that; when there is a man right behind the Senator to object all the time.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the Senator can suggest another way to get at it, I will give way to him. If he can suggest some way except by unanimous consent, of course I will let him try it.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator is very kind, and I appreciate it. However, I only desire to know whether he interposes an objection under the rule to taking the bill up to-morrow.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not object to anything that the Senator from Illinois moves, except to displace the appropriation bill, and that I shall object to always.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well. Then I will make a motion which the Senator's objection cannot overrule. I move now to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up Senate bill No. 1992, and I ask on that motion the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That of course would displace the appropriation bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course it would, if I can get a majority of the Senate to do it. I understand that. That is perfectly certain.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the pending motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves to postpone the present order, which is the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. WHYTE. That is not a proper motion. It must be to postpone to a day certain. There is no rule for the motion the Senator from Illinois has made. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] regularly makes that point.

Mr. INGALLS. Under the rules the motion must be to postpone to a day certain or to postpone indefinitely.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I move to postpone the appropriation bill until to-morrow.

Mr. EATON. I suggest that the motion is not in order at all. The appropriation bill was taken up by a vote of the Senate. When would there be any end to this mode of operation? Never in the world should we get through with any bill if after a bill has been taken up for the purpose of consideration by a vote, then a motion could be entertained to postpone it to another day. You never would get the consideration of a bill on earth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the Senator from Connecticut, and decides that the motion of the Senator from Illinois to postpone the present order is in order. That, therefore, is the pending question, and upon it the Senator from Illinois asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALLACE. I understand the pending order to be the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the order now before the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Anthony,	Cameron of Wis.,	Jones of Nevada,	Paddock,
Baldwin,	Conkling,	Kellogg,	Platt,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. F. KING, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. BECK, Mr. COCKRELL, Mr. GROVER, Mr. JONAS, and Mr. VANCE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7104) making appropriations for the construction, completion, repair, and preservation of certain works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH, Mr. GARLAND, Mr. INGALLS, and Mr. PADDOCK submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1992) to place Ulysses S. Grant, late General, and ex-President of the United States, upon the retired list of the Army; which was ordered to be printed.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Joint Select Committee on the subject of the new Library have authorized me to report certain amendments to the amendment proposed last evening by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] which on consultation with him he has accepted. I ask that they be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, in line 4, section 2, after the word "appropriated," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the land and the structures thereon which may be purchased or condemned under this act, and all damages for the taking thereof, shall not exceed $1,000,000.

Mr. VOORHEES. Also the following.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, in line 11, section 3, after the word "law," it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That no money hereby appropriated shall be expended for the purchase of said land or any part thereof, or for the erection thereon of said Library building, until the written opinion of the Attorney-General shall be had in favor of the validity of the title to said lands.

Mr. VOORHEES. Also the following.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, on page 3, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "shall," in line 12, to the word "oath," in line 14, and insert the following:

Before entering upon their duties take and subscribe an oath before some officer in the District of Columbia authorized to administer oaths, that they are entirely disinterested in the purchase or sale of said real estate, and that they will well and truly discharge their duties as such commissioners, and they shall then proceed to make.

Mr. VOORHEES. Also the following.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4, page 3, in line 23, after the word "for" it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That written notice of the time and place of appraisement shall be given by said commissioners to each owner of real estate, the purchase of which is contemplated by this act, at least thirty days before proceeding to appraise the same and in the case of a non-resident owner a similar notice shall be given by publication in two daily newspapers of general circulation published in the city of Washington; and if it shall appear that any owner or party otherwise interested in any portion of said real estate be a minor or otherwise incapacitated said court shall, before proceeding to the appointment of said commissioners, appoint some suitable person as guardian ad litem to represent such person in all further proceedings in reference to such portion of said estate under this act.

Mr. VOORHEES. Also the following additional section to be inserted after section 7, making section 8 as it stands now section 9.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest to the Senator to have them printed. That is all he desires.

Mr. VOORHEES. Of course I want them printed, but had they not better be reported?

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert the following as an additional section:

SEC. 8. Before payment shall be made for any part of the grounds herein described the terms of all contracts therefor and the amount of all appraisals thereof shall be submitted to the President for his approval; and if in his judgment the sum to be paid for any parcel, either under contract or judicial proceedings, shall be unreasonable, he shall in respect to the same suspend all further proceedings under this act till further action by Congress: Provided, That there shall not be taken or paid for, under this act, less than the squares numbered 729, 730, and 731, on the south side of East Capitol street, or the squares numbered 726, 727, and 728, on the north side of said street.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that these various amendments be printed in their proper place in the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, so that they can be considered to-morrow intelligently by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Appropriations.

A bill (H. R. No. 5066) to provide for the preparation of classified abridgments of all letters-patent of the United States—to the Committee on Patents.

A bill (H. R. No. 5713) for the benefit of Alderson T. Keene—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 6061) to incorporate the Cherokee and Arkansas River Railroad Company—to the Committee on Railroads.

A bill (H. R. No. 6848) granting a pension to John R. Wallace—to the Committee on Pensions.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 7101) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, after line 1669, to insert:

For the following additional clerical force in the Pension Office, namely: Twenty examiners, at $2,000 each; twenty clerks of class 4; twenty clerks of class 3; twenty clerks of class 2; fifty clerks of class 1; three assistant messengers; three watchmen; and five laborers; in all, $203,620; and for the like force for the balance of the current fiscal year, $50,905; the latter sum to be immediately available.

Mr. BLAIR. I was making some remarks to the Senate at the time the proceedings were interrupted yesterday afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. When the motion to take a recess for the purpose of holding an evening session was made yesterday afternoon I was expressing some views in relation to the amendments to the appropriation bill making large provision for the increase of the service in the Pension Office.

I desire to say in passing, recalling remarks by the honorable Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] and other honorable Senators upon the floor, that what has been known as the Bentley bill in the discussion which has proceeded in the Senate hitherto upon that bill, it of itself, upon its merits, has never been before the Senate at all. The whole debate arose, as will be recollected, upon a point of order, and when Senators saw fit as some did to enforce a vote upon that point of order a discussion upon the merits was necessarily interrupted; so that there never has been yet any opportunity whatever afforded for a vote in the Senate on the bill without amendment or for the offering of such amendments to that bill as the discussion seemed to make it necessary should be made in the case of its final passage.

Therefore, the assumption which has been made here that this bill sleepeth, that this bill has been rejected by the judgment of the Senate, is an incorrect assumption not based upon the fact. I think I am justified in claiming that if this bill could reach the Senate in a discussion upon its merits, it would be approved by the general sentiment of the Senate, with such modifications as might be suggested in the way of amendment. I desire to say this much, because there seems to be a sedulous attempt to create in the country at large, at least among all those who are interested in the pension law and its administration, the impression that this bill has been condemned by the judgment of the Senate. On the contrary, I believe it will be largely approved by that judgment whenever it can be fairly expressed.

The debate developed something very much akin to the nature of a personal assault upon the Commissioner of Pensions, as it will be remembered. Yesterday the Appropriations Committee, having reported amendments enlarging the force and increasing the expenditures in the Pension Office proper, Senators took pains to express the idea to the Senate that the Pension Commissioner himself had changed his views; that he now gave countenance to the idea that the law itself is right to which I expressed dissent at the time. I now find upon further examination that no such impression can properly be given. No conduct of the Pension Commissioner can be thus construed. On the contrary, his testimony before the Committee on Appropriations and also letters which he has sent to his superior, to the President, and to this House of Congress, all disclose simply the fact on his part that, entertaining as strongly now as ever the belief that the provisions of his bill requiring a modification of the law itself are essential to the removal of the great evil now existing in the country, yet finding that owing to the lateness of the session and perhaps to other causes it is not likely to get consideration at this time, he is very glad that there should be an increase of his force, although he believes and says that he thinks such increase is not the proper way of relieving the country of the great evils under which it is now suffering and with the perpetuation of which and the increase of which it is now threatened.

In justice to that somewhat as I think abused officer, and I will modify the expression by saying much abused officer, I wish to read in support of what I now state his letter of so recent a date as the 8th of February, which was drawn out by reason of large petitions addressed to the President by various organizations of soldiers throughout the country, and the request of the President for instruction from the Interior Department in reference to the evils complained of. This letter is addressed by the Commissioner of Pensions to his official superior, the Secretary of the Interior, dated the 8th of February, 1881, and is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 8, 1881.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt by your reference of the 2d instant of a letter of George W. Powers, commander of John A. Andrew Post, No. 15, G. A. R., department of Massachusetts, of the 1st ultimo, addressed to the President, together with the petitions of forty-three posts of the G. A. R. of the same department, also addressed to the President, requesting him to urge upon Congress the immediate necessity of adopting measures to obviate the delays and injustice attending the settlement of pension claims.

You request an expression of my opinion in the premises.

It is well known that the adjustment of the claims is attended by great delays, and that the claimants sometimes suffer injustice by reason of the rejection or improper rating of their pensions on the one hand, and on the other hand the Government is often imposed upon by fraudulent claimants.

The delays and injustice complained of, as well as the frauds, have been subject of comment in my annual reports from 1876 down. They mainly arise out of the secret ex parte methods of preparing the evidence in support of the claims, but have been to some extent, and now more than ever before are, chargeable to a lack of clerical force and office facilities in the Pension Office and in the offices of the Adjutant-General and Surgeon-General of the Army.

Since the evils which are the subject of complaint lie mainly in the secret ex parte system now in vogue, the most complete and comprehensive remedy must be looked for in the adoption of a system not liable in its administration to cause unnecessary delays, or result in injustice to the claimants and in imposition upon the Government.

The taking of the testimony in public, where the witness is known, before an officer whose duty it is to glean from him the facts, is the most direct and simple method which can be suggested or which has ever been discovered for eliciting the truth upon which questions are to be decided, whether relating to suits in court or to applications for pensions. Such proceedings in the latter class of cases, substituted for the present cumbersome and inadequate system, would doubtless secure a more just and speedy determination of claims, and at the same time, so far as it is practicable to do, protect the Government against frauds.

An addition to the force of clerks in the Pension Office of men who have been educated to the law, and who have had practical experience in the consideration of evidence, would hasten the settlement of many of the claims, but no increase in the force, however great, could secure a prompt settlement of all the claims, nor more than a small percentage, representing mainly claims which are supported by a record in the War Department. While it would in some degree reduce the time required for the settlement of the other class of cases, it could not settle them promptly. But partial and inadequate relief can therefore be expected from an increase of the office force. An increase of force at all equal to the emergency will render necessary a division of the office and a transfer of a portion of the records and files to another place. Until now such a division has been entirely impracticable, because the records were arranged upon a system which would not admit of a division. Now records upon a divisible system have lately been so far completed that a portion of them, with the corresponding files of unsettled claims, may be transferred to another place. Such a division, however, would be a source of much inconvenience in the transaction of business.

If the remedy for the evils complained of is to be sought in an increase of force of clerks, there should be an immediate appropriation for one hundred additional examiners and the proper complement of copyists, messengers, laborers, watchmen, &c., to be further increased by one hundred additional examiners on the 1st of July next. Provision should at once be made for additional room scarcely less commodious than that already occupied by the Pension Office.

At the same time additional clerks and perhaps office facilities should be provided for the Adjutant-General and Surgeon-General of the Army, the details of which increase they will doubtless understand and be able to explain better than I.

There is still another direction in which partial relief may be afforded, and that is by investigating claims on the spot by special agents. If this line is to be adopted, section 4744, Revised Statutes, should be amended by striking out the words "suspected attempts at fraud, through and by virtue of the pension laws," and insert the words "pension claims." The appropriation for that purpose should be not less than $250,000 per annum; and, in addition, provision should be made for one hundred and twenty-five additional clerks of class 1 to act as special agents, in order to enable the Commissioner of Pensions to employ a sufficient number of agents to investigate claims which should be investigated as they arise.

Permit me, in conclusion, to say that in pointing out these different directions in which relief may be sought, I indorse the first proposition only; the second is to be accepted only in case the first cannot be adopted; and the third as a part and parcel of the increase of office force, and in addition to the increase specified in the second proposition.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

J. A. BENTLEY,
Commissioner of Pensions.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

It will thus be seen from this recent expression of opinion by the Commissioner of Pensions that the provision made by the Committee on Appropriations is accepted simply because nothing else more efficient and more suitable to the relief of the evil can be obtained. The appropriations which he suggests here, and I may say the appropriations suggested by the committee even, are nearly if not entirely enough to put in practice, and, as I believe, to put in efficient practice, too, the system of taking testimony which he has recommended in his bill, with such modifications as the wisdom of the Senate might incorporate therewith. So that here to-day, while I do not oppose this appropriation and am anxious that it should be made, we are confronted, as I believe, with the anomaly of expending as much money as it would be necessary to expend to relieve the evil in a vain effort to only partially relieve it; accomplishing, as I believe, not one-fourth of the efficient service which might be made if we gave the same money in the other and proper direction.

The evils of this system it is very difficult indeed to point out to their full extent. I have received very lately a letter from a faithful soldier of the Union, which I desire to read to the Senate as an illustration of the evils and hardships of the existing system. This letter is addressed to a personal acquaintance of mine, and forwarded to me. It is dated at Haverhill, in my State, February 8, 1881. Addressing his friend, he goes on to say:

I received yours of January 21st, in due season, and about the same time I had orders to go to Lawrence, Massachusetts, for examination before Dr. H. M. Chase. I wrote to Dr. Chase that I was not able to go there either in strength or means, for it would cost me about twelve or fifteen dollars. I received a letter to-day from him saying that he had sent my letter to Washington and would wait further orders. I have been laid up since the last of November, about three months since I have been able to earn anything. I have got so I would eat some. I wrote to Mr. Lemon to-day. I thank you for looking after my case, and if you can assist Mr. Lemon I would like to have you, or if you could in any way get my claim made a special claim I will pay you for your trouble, for I am so used up myself and my wife has been sick a little over two years, it makes it hard for me to get along. If I am entitled to a pension I should like it now, not after we are dead; if I am not entitled to it, I have nothing more to say. It will be ten years next June since I made application. I think I ought to find out before long where I am.

Yours, &c.,

H. H. MORRISON.

This is not a case of very unusual hardship by any means, and I only read it to the Senate to show how under the existing system mistakes and errors and delays inevitably arise. This man resides in Haverhill, New Hampshire. It was through some mistake here at the Pension Office. It must have been supposed that he resided at Haverhill, Massachusetts, which place is within a very short distance of Lawrence, Massachusetts, where this examining surgeon resides; and so the office at Washington, not coming into contact with the pensioner, ignorant of the localities and of the distances, ordered this man to report for examination at a point over a hundred miles distant from where he resides, from the circumstance that they think he lives in Haverhill, Massachusetts, instead of Haverhill, New Hampshire, where he does reside. Upon an effort to correct the mistake this outsider being applied to, giving information verbally, the office makes another like mistake, and sends this man, as I learn since, to another point a hundred miles distant for examination there; and so it comes to pass that but for this friend who interposes for him he would in all human probability have been delayed one, two, three, four, or five years more upon this order to report for examination, for this man, poor as he is, is as utterly incapable of complying with that order as I should be of making a flight to the moon.

If, as suggested by the Commissioner as one feature of this bill, local examinations could be made, if those who take the testimony could come personally in contact with the applicant, a mistake of this kind would be utterly impossible. That man has been applying and working for ten years to secure the adjudication of his claim. If there is any shame on earth, if there is anything that would shame the memory of the father of this country more than the debate that we have listened to this morning, some portions of it, it is the circumstance that it is possible that a man under the laws of the country, and he one of the defenders of the country, one who put his blood into the cement of the nation which has given perpetuity to this great fabric which protects us all—that such a man by the legitimate result of the laws of the land can be subjected to hardships of the kind herein described; and yet the Congress of the United States when attention is called to it put off for six months and for six years longer, it may be, anything like definite action which will be really remedial to such cases.

I propose to take this opportunity by reason of the great importance that I attach to the subject to explain a little to the Senate, and at all events to make an explanation in such a way that it will reach the country through the press, the provisions of a bill which I have prepared and which is now pending in the Senate, embodying to some extent the features of the Bentley bill so-called, but with such essential modifications as I think make up for the short-comings of the Bentley bill and provide additional remedies for the pensioner and the claimants of pensions.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] suggests to me that if this clerk who happened to have the supervision of the case with reference to which this letter was written which I have just read to the Senate, had understood geography a little better, he might have been able to avoid this mistake. This claimant is not responsible. If the country employs a man so ignorant of geography that he sends the claimant a hundred miles when he really means to send him not more than five or six, that is not the fault of the pensioner, it is the fault of the system. Then I doubt whether any clerk however intelligent can be held responsible for mistakes which result with reference to the geographical location of many of the unimportant towns and places in the country.

Mr. TELLER. This man appears to have lived at Haverhill, in New Hampshire. He was ordered to Haverhill, Massachusetts.

Mr. BLAIR. No; to Lawrence, Massachusetts, on the supposition that it was near Haverhill.

Mr. TELLER. That might have occurred under any system where the whole control is left, as it is proposed to be substantially under the proposed system of the Senator from New Hampshire, with the Secretary of the Interior. I presume that when this clerk was examined for admission into the office of the Pension Bureau he was examined probably not on geography, and very likely not upon his capability of writing, but he was probably examined upon algebra, or geometry, or ancient history, or something of that kind. I have seen a great many more lamentable errors than the one mentioned simply growing out of the ignorance of a clerk of the geography of this country.

Mr. BLAIR. The remark of the Senator from Colorado makes it necessary for me to suggest to him that he is in the most profound and abject ignorance—and I wish he was here—as to the nature of the bill which Mr. Bentley or which I myself have advocated before the Senate. Remarks such as he made with reference to it would be, I have no doubt, avoided on his part at least if he would peruse the bills themselves. The essential feature of both is that it brings the agent of the office in contact with the applicant; and although the ultimate decision upon cases necessarily must be lodged in a tribunal here at Washington, the information is collected upon the spot, and the tribunal at Washington is not likely to decide cases in almost total ignorance of the nature of the proof upon which it acts.

The leading feature of the Bentley bill, as is well known, was to provide for the taking of this testimony substantially with the opportunity for cross-examination, by personal contact with the witness; but it did not provide for what I think to be quite as essential, and what minds trained at all in the ordinary proceedings of justice in the country will say is equally important, that the tribunal which listens to or takes the evidence itself, coming in contact with the witnesses, shall be enabled to avail itself of those tests of the truth of testimony which, time immemorial, have been found the most important. Thus, by the actual inspection of the witness himself, the tribunal, whether he be a commissioner, whether he be a clerk, an auditor, or examiner, or by whatever name he may be called, shall be not only competent enough to take testimony, but also sufficiently competent and have the opportunity to understand what the testimony means, its force and effect, and to make up his mind and have a conviction as to what it proves or does not prove. Testimony taken in that way, and then passed upon by a man competent to pass upon its truth or its falsehood, would become the basis of reliable and satisfactory action by the authorities here at Washington, first by the Commissioner, and then if need be by the Secretary of the Interior. The Bentley bill provided only for the taking of the testimony, while I have provided in this bill that the facts shall be found by the same agency which takes the testimony, and then, further, that in the taking of testimony not merely what in an ordinary court of justice may be received as pertinent, but testimony may be taken—

Which may include, in the discretion of the Commissioner, matter of reputation, hearsay, and common report, as well as direct evidence, of pensioners and claimants and of witnesses in such claims, and may be required to submit their conclusions upon the facts proved by the evidence before them; and the testimony taken in other districts, as well as that in possession of any Department of the Government, appropriate to be considered in any case, shall be transmitted by the Commissioner to the examiner to whom the case shall have been referred, to be by him considered with the evidence taken by himself; and all evidence coming to his possession shall be returned by the examiner, together with his finding thereon, to the Commissioner of Pensions for action upon the same.

In regard to the first branch, that is, as to the nature of such testimony which the examiner should be allowed to take, comprising not only ordinary testimony, but matters of reputation, hearsay, and common report, any one who is at all familiar with the prosecution of pension claims very well knows, especially in those cases where relief is sought by reason of the death of a son or of a husband upon whom the widow and children or the parent was dependent for support, knows how exceedingly difficult it is to prove the matter of dependence and the contribution during the life-time of the soldier to the support of the parent and of the family. The office requires proof of some precise act of contribution, that the wages derived from labor on the part of the son were paid on a certain occasion by some employer to the parent for the support of the family, or that while in the Army he transmitted more or less of the wages paid to him for their support. The transmission of money, some actual, specific contribution, must be proven; but everybody knows how exceedingly difficult that very often is to prove.

Yet the physician who received pay, it may be for his bill by reason of that very contribution, the merchant who sold the necessaries of life to this poor family and received his compensation from that same money transmitted by the soldier, or the overseer of the poor perhaps knew of the son contributing something to keep that family from the poor farm; yet these parties, none of them having positive knowledge of the transmission of the money itself, but knowing as a matter of common report where it did come from, really know the fact of contribution better than anybody else knows it, and they are the most reliable sources of evidence. Testimony by common report, reputation, hearsay, in the neighborhood where the party lives, coming from such reliable sources, is the best evidence that can possibly be obtained in the great majority of cases with reference to the point of dependence and contribution for support. So in relation to other points. Unless evidence of that kind can be received the result must be in a vast number of just cases the rejection of the claims. The office winks at the matter somewhat, I suppose, and sometimes does receive that sort of testimony, yet there is no regulation to do it; but if it could be taken by a man acquainted in the locality who could see the parties and investigate and find out from these witnesses themselves by personal contact with them in regard to the truth, such evidence would become perhaps as satisfactory as any that could be obtained in any case.

In regard to the examiner finding upon the question of fact, I have said all that I care to say. It is sufficiently obvious as a desirable thing, I imagine, to any man who is at all acquainted with the processes of law and the effect of evidence upon the human mind.

A defect in the Bentley bill, the most serious one, and one for which it was most severely criticised in the discussion here, was the fact that it designed to appoint only one of these agents or examiners in each congressional district and to substitute the labors of that one man for what I have no doubt in most of the districts of this country, where many of the soldiers reside, from twenty to forty men are engaged in performing. Of course it is an utter impossibility with from 1,500 to 2,000 cases already on the docket, so to speak, with one man only to go all over a congressional district which may in some cases be larger than my own State, embracing, as I understand, in many instances twenty, thirty, forty, and fifty counties, several hundred miles in length, if this one man is expected to collect the testimony in all this great number of cases and to pass upon the facts and forward his report to the city of Washington for action thereon that the business should not get behind. Of course it is an utter impossibility for one man to do all this. I have therefore, to obviate this evil, provided that when the exigencies of the public service require, at least four such examiners might be appointed in a single congressional district. That is not a sufficient number to perform the labor, but it is a sufficient number, as I believe, in connection with other agencies that are provided in later portions of the bill to relieve the evil, and to those other agencies I will advert as I reach them.

The bill of Mr. Bentley provided that the examiner and the surgeon should visit the county seat at least three times a year, and in case of sickness and disability of a claimant or of a witness he might visit them in person. There, it seems to me, in practice would be found to be a very marked defect in the operation of such a law. He is to visit the county seat three times a year. He is under no necessity of going anywhere else, unless in case of the sickness or disability of a claimant or of his witnesses. Under a provision of that kind it would be utterly impossible, without very great expense to the claimant in securing his witnesses and other attendants, to find the examiner at all. There are instances in the constitution of counties in this country where the claimant with his witnesses would be obliged to travel from forty to one hundred miles distance, taking his witnesses along with him, those who are available within the district, bearing their expenses from home on the journey, and while awaiting action upon it may be fifty, sixty, or one hundred cases preceding his own; so that this would go to impose upon the pensioner or upon the claimant a most expensive species of lawsuit, and it would be utterly without remedy for the evils which now exist.

To obviate that I have provided in the bill which I have prepared that the examiner shall not only visit the county seat, but he shall visit every other place in the county and in the district where it can be reasonably expected that he should go, in order to give proper facilities to the claimant and his witnesses for the taking of testimony. Further, in regard to a man who, by reason of sickness and disability, cannot attend, I have provided that when "poverty or any other good cause" exists, so that it is difficult, inconvenient, or beyond the reasonable exertion of his power to find the examiner, the examiner shall go wherever the witness or the claimant may be, and go there as he does in all other cases, at the expense of the Government. Therefore, in view of all these provisions, there can be no fault found with the measure which I am advocating upon the ground that the examiner will not find the witnesses or the witnesses find the examiner, and all those evils be obviated, as they should be.

That provision I will read. It is as follows:

The examiners and surgeons shall together visit each county seat in their respective districts as often as three times in each year, unless otherwise directed by the Commissioner of Pensions, for the purpose of performing the duties prescribed by this act, and shall also, for the same purpose, and to accommodate claimants so far as shall be reasonable, visit other places in their respective districts, from time to time; and whenever any pensioner, claimant, or witness, whose presence before the examiner or surgeon is necessary to the proper determination of a matter pending before the Commissioner of Pensions, shall, because of illness or disability, poverty, or other good cause, be unable to travel to an appointed place to appear before the examiner and surgeon, one or both, as the necessities of the case may seem to require, shall visit such pensioner, claimant, or witness, as the case may be, and take such person's testimony, or make the required medical examination.

Another difficulty, and a very great difficulty with what was known as the Bentley bill, according to the construction which was given to it, though I hardly think it was open to that objection, was that it was supposed that it would turn over all cases now pending to these examiners, the whole testimony to be taken de novo, taken anew, as from the beginning, of course ignoring the great mass of testimony which has been collected it may be years ago, and all the way down to the present time to a great extent, reliable and trustworthy testimony—ignoring all that and subjecting the claimant to a new preparation for the decision of his case, as though really he had not filed his application until the passage of the bill. To guard against any such misapprehension as that, and make specific provision in reference to it, I have inserted the following clause:

Testimony already filed in pending cases shall be considered in support thereof, and testimony hereafter taken and filed, in accordance with law and the practice which has hitherto prevailed in the administration of the pension laws, shall be received and considered in support of any claim; but in such case the Commissioner of Pensions may require the testimony of any witness to be retaken by an examiner, at the expense of the United States, if he shall be of the opinion that the same is necessary.

It will be borne in mind that under this system most of the testimony will be taken at the expense of the United States, so that there is no hardship imposed upon the Government by this provision:

And nothing in this act shall be construed as a denial of the right of the claimant to employ and pay for such assistance as he may have received, or may desire to receive, in the prosecution of any claim, nor shall it be wrongful for any person to accept payment for the same within the limitations of existing law.

Much of the controversy that has arisen upon this subject has been attributed to the opposition of the claim agents, as they are called, to the Bentley bill. I think there is this to be said for the claim agents of the country: I have no doubt that the great mass of them are honest men. I believe the great mass of them have undertaken to do their duty and are anxious for the successful prosecution of all just claims. I ought to say further that from a hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand of the pending claims are being pushed by pension agents. Large masses of them are in charge of agents here at Washington, at Chicago, at New York, at Boston, and other great centers of the country. I have no doubt that most of these gentlemen are honorable gentlemen, and their business has grown up under the protection of the law of the land, which we made and gave to them. One feature of that law was that no applicant for a pension under the Government or for a bounty under the provisions of law could be allowed, that it should be practically impossible for him, to employ local and competent assistance such as the poorest litigant is enabled to employ when he comes to the courts of the country, and why? We limit their compensation to $10 in all cases. That has been the law most of the time. For a while we enlarged it to $25, which must, however, be done by a special contract. The great mass of these cases cannot be properly prepared for a hearing before the tribunal here at Washington, or anywhere else, by a man who knows how to do it, whose business it is to prepare evidence and put it in proper form for consideration by any tribunal, for less than $20, $30, $50, or $100, as the case may be.

The result is, that while if this claimant or pensioner was wronged to the extent of five cents, he could go to competent counsel, if an honest man, and get trusted by a local lawyer, or by some legal person competent to take evidence and prepare his cause for court under the ordinary laws of the State and of the land; yet when he comes to the prosecution of a claim under the pension laws, or under the bounty laws of the country, he is obliged by the enactment of the law and the penalty attached to its violation to employ a man who is not fit to do the work, or to get no assistance at all.

Thus these poor illiterate men who saved the country are by this original provision in our law deprived of local and competent help, unless it is given as a matter of charity. What is the result? Men organize as they have done here at Washington; they organize bureaus for the prosecution of pension claims. They do their business by wholesale; they advertise to the whole country that they have at Washington special facilities for the transaction of business, and are accorded privileges for doing it in a wholesale way, and doing it, too, in such a way under the faults of the system that, getting largely their pay in advance, they are enabled to live; whereas, if the claimant was allowed to employ local assistance, (and he could get trusted when he is without the money,) he would get his case prepared, and he would all through these years of the past have been enabled to get his case prepared and transmitted in proper form for consideration to the authorities here at Washington. Thus the evil results in depriving these men of competent assistance at home. This defect in the law has created this great evil in practice, and has given rise to the frauds of the claim agents very largely, when they have been committed at all.

Now, sir, I think it is proper to go further and say that the Bentley pension bill did a wrong in striking out from underneath claim agents any possible prospect of compensation, so far as they have not been requited, for a very large mass of work which they have done under the present system; and generally I have no doubt honorably and honestly done, and as well as they could. In striking out from under them the possibility of securing compensation, the bill if it had become a law would have committed a great wrong. If the claim agents themselves are wrong, we are as much to blame for their existence as anybody. They grow naturally out of the operation of the existing law, and I think it only right that explicit provision should be made in the law we may enact on the subject that not only may claimants continue to employ, as they have hitherto done, claim agents at home or elsewhere if they can better satisfy themselves in that way, and that the claim agent shall be allowed to secure his fee, which under existing law can in no case be over $10. I would repeal the provision entirely, if I had anything to do about it, and let the party get his help at home from competent sources and pay for it in such way that he would be able to get, it might be a lawyer or it might be some other person able to take his testimony in proper form.

As I said awhile ago, even four men in a congressional district will not be able to take this business and reform it; they will do much toward it, but in practice you will find that neither four nor ten men will transact this business with sufficient rapidity to gain at all upon the applications, of which we have nearly three hundred thousand already pending. Therefore, I have provided here that the existing law, so far as taking the testimony is concerned, and the existing practice may continue in operation to regulate claim agents, subject to the right of the Commissioner, if he thinks the evidence is suspicious in any way, to retake the testimony of any particular witness, and subject to that right the existing agencies may continue in operation in connection with the modifications of the system which are suggested.

Any one will see that in practical operation, it being known that here are four men in a congressional district who take testimony in behalf of the Government as well as in behalf of the applicant himself, any honest applicant will naturally seek one of those men to do his business if possible. That man will do it for nothing, the Government paying his expenses. For two reasons, then, the honest applicant will seek out the examiner if it is possible to get him: First, he is freed from the burden of compensation to the examiner, whereas he must pay his agent; in the next place, he will have the impression that when an examiner takes his testimony due credence and consideration will be likely to be given the testimony thus taken by that examiner; it will obtain belief here at Washington where will be the deciding tribunal. Then that examiner will pass upon the question of fact also, as previously suggested, and he will be much more likely to pass favorably on testimony which he has himself taken than that which comes to him from other sources. Therefore the inclination or drift of this business will be to an examiner for these reasons. A great deal undoubtedly will be taken by the claim agents, but every claim agent will know, and every witness will know when he is testifying that every particle of testimony he gives before the agent is sure to be reviewed, and if there is any suspicious circumstance attached to it that it will be retaken by the examiner, and therefore he will testify under the supposition that if he perjures himself he is likely very soon to be detected in so doing; and as the claim agent will know this, too, there will be another very great safeguard which does not exist in taking testimony under the existing law and the existing practice.

Another objection urged to any bill whatever which proposes the taking of testimony by an officer in the locality has been that only a part of the testimony in any case whatever is to be found exclusively within the jurisdiction of a single examiner; but this bill provides that the testimony in other jurisdictions shall be taken by a like officer in that jurisdiction precisely in analogy to the way in which a court in a given jurisdiction where a cause is being tried now authorizes the taking of depositions in other States and in other jurisdictions, the same to be remitted to the place where the cause is to be tried. In just that same way the testimony of witnesses will be taken elsewhere and remitted to the Pension Office or directly to the examiner who has to pass upon the questions of fact, being the examiner who has the case primarily under his jurisdiction. In this matter there can be no greater difficulty than now exists in the collection of testimony from various parts of the country and its concentration here in Washington before it is considered. There is no objection, as any one will see, to the operation of this bill more than exists under the operation of the present law.

Much complaint has, as I think justly, been made in this country on the practice of the Pension Office in the investigations through the operations of special agents of cases once allowed and pending on the pension-roll. Upon the most trivial suggestions that something was wrong, suggestions coming from an irresponsible source, oftentimes from a malevolent source, persons are suspended that remain suspended for years, and perhaps the party dies without ever having received one cent of a claim which was perfectly just.

I have proposed this modification of the existing law that the Commissioner of Pensions wherever he thinks there should be an inquiry into a pending case may institute that inquiry, no matter how trivial the cause for inquiry may be, if he is of opinion that there should be one. He complains that under the existing law he must have some substantial proof of the existence of fraud before he can inquire. I think that any one will see that the opportunity to inquire should exist upon the slightest suggestion that there is any fraud being perpetrated, and therefore I have incorporated that provision in this bill in the language which I will read:

SEC. 7. That if, after a pension has been allowed, the Commissioner of Pensions shall have good cause to believe that the same has been procured through fraud or misrepresentation, or for any other reason is of opinion that it ought not to continue without inquiry, he shall cause the case to be investigated by the examiner or surgeon, or by both acting together, of the district where the claimant or witnesses reside, after first giving reasonable notice to the pensioner of time and place of such intended investigation; and the claimant or pensioner whose case is being investigated may be present at the examination of the witnesses upon such investigation, and may produce witnesses and testimony, at the expense of the Government, in his own behalf. And until there shall have been an adverse decision upon such testimony the payment of the pension shall not be withheld, except in cases where the information of the Commissioner, in his judgment, is conclusive in the first instance, but in no such case shall an investigation be denied upon application of the pensioner.

Here is a provision that there shall be no suspension of the payment of the pension until there is an adverse decision against the pensioner. I think the absolute justice of a provision of that kind, which is not in contravention of existing law and practice, must be apparent to every one. Here is a man who has established his claim against the Government. He has a judgment against the nation for his pension; the record is made up; and yet under existing practice any irresponsible party may in effect contradict and annul the operation of that record which the country has made against itself. At the same time when an investigation and a report from a special agent shall have resulted adversely to the claimant, it does seem to be right that further payment of the claim should be suspended and should be suspended during the operation of these two remedies in the nature of an appeal which are provided for the pensioner. The feature that such an investigation should be conducted at the expense of the United States I think is proper, and that witnesses may be produced by the claimant at the expense of the United States is also a very proper provision, for as a rule the claimant is a man who is unable to defend himself; and when once the Government has decided against itself, that man certainly ought not to be deprived of his pension except in the most flagrant cases which are here provided for, unless the opportunity of defense is afforded him in the first instance, because the result of an adverse decision is a suspension of claim for a very great length of time.

I have provided further.

And whenever a pension shall be discontinued, an appeal shall be allowed to the Secretary of the Interior, and if his decision is adverse to the pensioner, then the pensioner may appeal from such decision of the Secretary of the Interior to that district court of the United States which may be most convenient to the pensioner; and such appeal, with all documents and evidence, or true copies thereof, as shall appertain to such case, shall be transmitted to such court; and the judge of such court, upon notice and hearing by himself or a competent and impartial master or commissioner to be by him appointed, shall examine all the proofs and finally decide such appeal as may be just. And if such appeal from the decision of the Commissioner to the Secretary of the Interior, or from the Secretary to the district court, shall be sustained, all reasonable costs shall be allowed and paid to the appellant, upon certificate of the Secretary of the Interior or of the judge of the district court.

It does seem to me the height of injustice that the decision of a special agent or of a clerk or of an examiner against a pension case should be final or practically final; and yet that is so to-day in a great majority of cases. The special agent reports to the Commissioner of Pensions. If, as is usually the case, the claimant asks to be heard, and objects to this finding, what has the Commissioner to go upon but the report of his special agent? Practically nothing; and unless this pensioner has some outside friend, some friend at court, some Senator, or Member of Congress, somebody who can go down to the Pension Office and with the semblance of authority, or in a way which is not ordinarily disregarded, investigate that cause for himself, the decision of the pension agent is final and conclusive against the pensioner. He may appeal to the Commissioner; but the Commissioner decides too often just as the special agent does. He has still an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior; but how can the Secretary of the Interior revise the findings of the Commissioner of Pensions on questions of this kind? He has more than he can do in connection with the other duties of his office; and I do not suppose that the Secretary of the Interior ever really revises the findings of the Commissioner of Pensions upon an appeal case of this kind in one instance out of five hundred. Practically the finding of the special agent, then, is conclusive.

It seems to me we are perpetrating a great injustice unless we make some provision for an appeal beyond the Secretary of the Interior to a tribunal which can be reached by every man, and, therefore, I have provided that he may carry his appeal from these proceedings here at Washington, if adverse to him, to the district court which is most convenient to his own place of residence, not necessarily the one in that district where he happens to live himself, because he may live on the edge of one district, and close to the place where the judge in another district resides just across the line. He may appeal to that judge of the district court most convenient to himself, and be there heard, and heard on all the testimony, the original or copies thereof which will be submitted from the Secretary of the Interior to the judge of the district court, and that the judge, either by himself or, if unable to attend to it by himself, through some competent and impartial commissioner to be by him appointed, shall hear and finally decide that appeal. If it is decided, after all this, in favor of the appellant, the United States will pay such bill of costs as the Secretary of the Interior and the judge of the court shall approve.

In this hasty way, sir, I have explained many at least of the substantial provisions of this bill. Other features I indicated in my remarks of yesterday. I am aware that we can hardly hope for any action by Congress at the present session; but when we take action at some time, (and we shall revise the pension law,) these suggestions I think are worthy of consideration by the Senate and by the country, and I have taken this opportunity a little outside of the provisions of the appropriation bill to explain away the persistent misunderstanding which has seemed to exist on this subject as to the nature of the bill reported by the committee, and this which I have myself had the honor to present.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope we shall proceed with the bill.

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask a question either of the chairman of the committee or of the Senator from Kentucky in regard to this pension provision. Are the committee satisfied that the provision they have made for clerks in the Pension Office will enable the Pension Office to provide for the prompt disposition of cases now there and those that will accumulate there by reason of the increased rapidity with which the information will come from the other offices? In other words, under the new provision will not the size of the pond at the Pension Office continue to increase beyond what it is now, owing to the fact that there will be a much larger amount coming in? Have the committee considered that question? I ask the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BECK. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow the chairman of the committee to answer, I would prefer that he should, because he was one of the sub-committee who carefully investigated the question.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the Senator from Kentucky had this special matter in charge from something he said the other day. I beg the chairman's pardon, and ask the question of him.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The whole Committee on Appropriations of course considered the question, at which meeting my colleague on the committee was present; but of the sub-committee which considered this bill I was chairman, and with me were the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] and the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.] The Senator from Kentucky may not therefore be as familiar with this matter as the rest of us.

I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts that the sub-committee considered this question as thoroughly as it could have been considered by any persons; they were two or three days in considering it; and what is found in the amendment reported to the bill is the result of their labors and, as they believe, what is best suited for each of the officers mentioned, and they will be aids to one another. If either one was increased to a greater extent than the others, then the others would have to wait. On that subject I have the Pension Commissioner's report in my hand.

There is an impression that the 307,000 cases which are now pending in the Pension Office have been pending there for many years. That impression is wrong. This report, for seventeen years up to and including 1878, shows that there are now 132,000 old cases in the office, and there are 175,000 new cases which were never presented before 1879. So more than half, nearly two-thirds of the cases now pending in the office have been presented there by applicants within the last two years.

Mr. HOAR. My point is, that making this provision that you have made in your bill for added clerks, will not the accumulation in the Pension Office still increase, so that six months or twelve months from now you will have a larger number waiting than are waiting now; so that the man or the widow who presents his or her petition for the first time will have to wait longer even than a person who presented his or her petition three years ago?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No; I think the Senator is wrong in that supposition.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator know and is he authorized to state the opinion of the Commissioner of Pensions on that point?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not know that I can give his words on that point; I do not know whether he was specially asked on that point; but I do know that the cases are now coming in much less in number per month than they were three or four months ago. They have decreased very rapidly. They increased more rapidly after the arrears-of-pension bill passed, but now they are decreasing, so that the number is not so great as it was a few months ago. In addition to that, with this force which the Senator sees is one hundred and thirty additional clerks in the Pension Office itself, the Commissioner of Pensions believes he can about double the number of cases that he examines, and the cases disposed of in a given time will be double the number disposed of heretofore in the same time.

Mr. HOAR. I am speaking of the Pension Office proper, as distinct from the other offices.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. So am I speaking of the Pension Office proper. With this additional force the cases will be decreased rapidly according to the testimony and according to our belief.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator means this, doubtless, or at least I understand from what I have read in reference to it, that the applications for arrears of pensions are all in.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. And that the applications which are being made now are for pensions originally and not for arrears, and hence the cases are not near so great in number as they were during the time the applications were made for arrears of pensions. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. They are becoming less each month.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, and the additional force will cause the examination of three cases for one, as I understood the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. At least two to one.

Mr. LOGAN. I think three to one. I will give that as my own opinion anyhow. Now, the fact that there are 20,000 cases in the Medical Bureau of the War Department unexamined shows that it makes no difference what kind of machinery you have in the Pension Office you have got to supply the force for the Medical Bureau of the War Department, the examining part of the War Department, in order to facilitate these matters and get cases reported by the Medical Bureau of the War Department to the Pension Office before they can be acted upon; and there is one of the great troubles. So the force in the Medical Bureau of the War Department is more important than the force in any other portion of the Departments connected with the Pension Office. I merely state that in this connection, and I want to call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to it.

Mr. BECK. I was unable to agree with my colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations as to the wisdom of the amendments they have proposed. I rarely differ with the committee, and regret having to do so now. When the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] made his speech during the consideration of the pension appropriation bill, and offered the following amendment—

To provide fifty additional examiners for the Pension Office, and the number of clerks for the Pension Office and Adjutant-General's and Surgeon-General's Offices, respectively, necessary to render effective the work of said examiners, the sum of $200,000, to be immediately available—

I thought he was making a most extravagant proposition under all the circumstances; we therefore asked for time, and determined that we would look into it carefully, have an examination made, and endeavor to see what would be the force needed to do the work, never suspecting that it would require $200,000 for additional clerical hire; but instead of that the majority of the committee have felt themselves compelled to add to the Pension Office $388,000, to the Adjutant-General's Office $36,000, to the Surgeon-General's Office $43,000, in other words $468,550; not content with that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] now persuades the Senate to add fifteen more clerks to the Surgeon-General's Office. In other words it has been apparent to me from the beginning of the arrears-of-pension craze—for that is what it is—that we were going to incur more debt, bring more responsibility upon this Government, much of it for fraudulent claims, and fasten a burden upon the country that would last longer than the national debt, and it is rapidly getting from bad to worse. Every suggestion made for an increase of compensation, an increase of clerks to hurry up anything almost to go through without any halt, is agreed to. I do not expect to be able to stop it, though I have tried as hard as I could, and have been criticised pretty severely for doing it.

I said the other day, and I repeat now, that in 1872 there were only a fraction over 8,000 invalids applying for pensions from the Army of the United States, and 6,000 widows of soldiers. That was nine years ago when presumably there were a great many more of those people living than there are to-day. That was seven years after the war was over. We passed the arrears-of-pension act two years ago, whereby from $1,000 to $1,200 or $1,300 was given to everybody who could get on the pension-roll, and in the year 1880 110,673 applicants applied as invalids from the Army and 25,602 widows filed applications. From the Navy in 1871 the applicants were 190 as invalids and 140 as widows; and in 1880 after the arrears were given there were 1,361 naval applicants for invalid pensions and 959 widows, running it up to something near $170,000,000 or $180,000,000 in a year or so. Every effort made by the Committees on Pensions in both branches of Congress, by the Commissioner of Pensions, and by the other officers of the Government to have a thorough investigation as to how many of these are fraudulent, has been voted down or disregarded. Whether the propositions were the best that could be made, I do not know; I am not a member of the Committee on Pensions; but the struggle has been——

Mr. BLAIR. Allow me to say that the action of the Pensions Committee has never been voted down. A question of order was raised, and that was enforced to, as I think, the exclusion of the expression of the real sentiment of the Senate upon Senate bill No. 496, and we are actually without remedy.

Mr. BECK. Some how or other it has been defeated, and every proposition has been defeated except a proposition to employ all the clerks possible to hurry through claims that have been gotten up in the country to pay large sums to these one hundred and seventy-odd thousand applicants who in the last year or so filed their claims. There has been but little delay in regard to the old claims. It has always seemed to me, and seems to me now, that if invalid soldiers, or persons claiming to be invalid soldiers, or the widows of soldiers, or invalid sailors, or the widows of sailors, have waited from 1865 to 1880 before they filed their claims, they ought not to complain if the Government of the United States before it pays each of them from $1,200 to $1,500 should have an investigation made as to whether or not they were really bona fide claimants, and into the reasons which induced them to wait so long. The Commissioner of Pensions has told us that he has no efficient means of preventing fraud in these matters. He has said, and I believe him, that 10 per cent. of all that he has paid is paid on frandulent claims, and the proportion is doubtless as great on pending demands, and my belief is that it is more than that; that more than 10 per cent. of those now sought to be rushed through are fraudulent claims; and there is no efficient machinery sought to be provided, with all the money we are giving, to stop the payment of any of them, but clerks are appointed in the different Departments here to hurry up the work, and to do it before any examination can be had and without any attempt at any judicial or other investigation in regard to them.

Who are the clerks that are to be appointed? Clerks who can get positions only upon the application of Senators and Members of Congress, with no other qualification required except that they will, when the campaign committee demands 10 per cent. of their salary, pay it. Only that sort can stay there, and if a man who is ever so well qualified refuses to pay the per cent. demanded out of his salary, he cannot stay. They need no other qualification; they want no other guarantee of fitness except that he is a partisan and will support his leaders, and is of sufficient importance to have Senators and Representatives go to the Department and put him there, against the will of the Commissioner of Pensions and against the good of the public service.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word right on this point? I do not know that I can correct his statement; but I would desire to suggest to him that probably he is in error about that. Does he not know that every clerk in the Pension Office is placed there by competitive examination on the order of the Secretary of the Interior, and that persons are not appointed otherwise than by competitive examination?

Mr. BECK. There may be a form and an apparent farce of competitive examination, but if the Senator from Illinois was to send a man there and I was to send a man there, and my man was ten times as well qualified he would not have a ghost of a chance to get the place, and if he did get it and the campaign committee demanded of him 10 per cent. of his wages and he refused to pay it, although it would be asked as a "voluntary contribution," he would get permanent leave of absence the next morning without pay, while the Senator's man would stay there if he paid his money, no matter how useless he was.

This is the sort of machinery to guard the public interest we are now asked to furnish, and that is all we are asked to furnish. The examiners are to be twelve-hundred-dollar clerks, with $1,800 additional for their expenses, traveling all over the country; and when they go anywhere what do they know about the neighborhood into which they are sent, or what do they care? They were placed in power because they had political influence; they are not going to find out anything against anybody; they will draw their $1,800 for expenses; they will live at the best hotels; they will do as little as possible; nobody will be hurt or interfered with by them. They will take good care not to offend their friends, by whose favor they hold their places; they are part of a political machine. We can hire for less money than we are now asked to give for traveling expenses to these useless partisan retainers a competent young attorney in any neighborhood where invalid soldiers are, who will do the work required and do it well. Furnish him the list of pensioners in the different counties where he resides and is acquainted, and he will ask no more than we are now about to give for traveling expenses, and he will develop the facts. I do not know the best way to do the work; but there is no attempt made in this bill, and there will be no attempt made by the provisions proposed, to stop these fraudulent payments. Everything is done to hurry them through; no attempt is made to have a judicial investigation into the frauds for the benefit of the Government or of the honest soldier, because every fraudulent claim that gets through brings disrepute upon the claim of the man who ought to have it.

I say that all this additional machinery is to hurry these claims through, most of them being of people who have held them back from 1865, when the war closed, up to 1880, and then rushed in, stimulated by the arrears-of-pension act, until 170,000 have applied in the last year or two, as the chairman of the committee says, as against 8,000 ten years ago; and we are forsooth to stop everything else to pile nearly five hundred thousand dollars to add to the force in these Departments under a system that the Commissioner himself says is wholly defective, and that we all know is shamelessly evaded. Under the proposed increase they will get the money out of the Treasury rapidly, and possibly increase the pension-roll $50,000,000 additional this year.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise to make a speech. The Pension Commissioner, I think, is the man who, above all others, has met the most severe rebukes in this Hall. Why? Because he tells you there are frauds; because he seeks to have something done to prevent them? That, of course, cannot be the reason that operates on the minds of Senators. What is it? He has done his duty fearlessly; he has protested against this rushing of claims through until you give him better machinery to see whether they are honest claims or not. The amendments to this bill furnish none of that facility. They do furnish facility to push claims through before the facts can be investigated, and they hurry them through by the employment of men not selected for their fitness, not kept there for their fitness, but political partisans, placed and held there because they are supposed to have political power and influence with republican politicians.

I would hold back these applicants, as they have themselves held back so long, from making their claims until I could have an investigation made to see that no dishonest man drew money out of the Treasury, that no pension agent had worked up a case by false affidavits, and that men who were really competent, who were familiar with the people in the neighborhood, had investigated the cases fairly. Why, Mr. President, it is the simplest thing in the world, if Congress desires to do its duty, to find a competent man for this work in any neighborhood. We are giving each of these men $3,000 a year, $1,200 as salary and $1,800 as expenses. Judges in my State get $2,500 a year, and work all the year round and in their chancery courts at night. For $3,000 a year we can get men in every circuit who will see to it that the United States is protected and that honest pensioners are protected at less money than we are proposing to pay to mere clerks—$1,200 a year and $1,800 for expenses. That will hire a first-rate man anywhere. Take such a man, make him a commissioner, or what you like; you can give him authority to call on all the internal revenue officers, and we have them in every corner of the country. Let him call upon our collectors, their deputies, their storekeepers, their gaugers, or the postmasters, the detectives, the employés that are going around watching the different retail and wholesale stores in the country, looking after the interests of the Government, the marshals, the deputy marshals, the whole machinery of Federal authority can be used without a dollar of expense to obtain the information for the officer that can be employed for less money than we are giving to these clerks now. Who are the men it is proposed by this bill to employ? Politicians are not put into the Pension Office at $1,200 a year, which is the lowest grade clerks, because they know anything, but merely to keep some poor fellow from starving whose father is a good politician, or who has himself been active in some race for Congress and who has some political influence. If we will select proper men in the different localities we can save millions. A hundred millions, I expect, can be saved if we will only put some sort of machinery in operation under competent men and pay less money than we are now paying, and we will make every honest soldier and the widow of every honest soldier feel that they are protected against being considered a part of this great fraudulent machinery which our officials certify is now at work.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BECK. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. Do I understand the Senator from Kentucky to say that appointments are made in the Pension Office as a reward for political services?

Mr. BECK. I have no doubt about it, and in every other Department of the Government as well. I have seen a collector in my own State turned out because he was not a partisan of the present Administration. I have seen it done more than once elsewhere; it is done every day. As the Senator well knows, men are removed against whom no complaint can be made. It is partisanship everywhere, not in the Pension Office alone, but everywhere else.

Mr. PLUMB. If it is for the benefit of party, I ask the Senator for which party? If the Senator from Kentucky thinks these appointments are made for the benefit of party, I ask him for which party?

Mr. BECK. For the benefit of the republican party, or that branch of it which is in power now, and they will be turned out perhaps if the next Administration is not in accord with the present one. I do not say the democratic party would not do it if they were in power. Do not understand me as saying we are any better than you are, but I mean to say that no man gets into any position unless he is a partisan, and he is not often appointed for his fitness, but because of his usefulness as a partisan.

Mr. PLUMB. In the first place, I want to correct the Senator as to one point. He speaks of branches of the republican party. I do not know of any divisions in the party.

Mr. BECK. Perhaps not. There may not be any.

Mr. PLUMB. In the next place, I noticed the other day——

Mr. BECK. There was a good deal of it at Chicago, if I recollect aright. But I do not care anything about that. You healed it, I admit.

Mr. PLUMB. I noticed a statement some time ago, and in fact some weeks ago, in a paper, which has gone the rounds—I saw it in an Ohio paper, a Chicago paper, a New York paper, and last in a Washington paper—which so far as I know has not been denied, that a Congressman from Ohio who is not a republican and who belongs either to one of the branches of the democratic party or to the party after the branches have all come together in the shape of a trunk, had secured the appointment of fifty-five persons, political and personal friends of his, in the various bureaus of the Government during his two years of service; and as he has two more years to serve, having been re-elected, he will of course be able to secure the appointment of as many more; in fact he ought to be able to secure a good many more, because he has learned something in the meantime. Now if the others have done as well—and I have no reason to suppose they have not—I think I can prove to the Senator from Kentucky by a mathematical demonstration that all the employés of the Government must be members of the democratic party.

Mr. BECK. That sort of logic perhaps may convince somebody.

Mr. PLUMB. So that the suggestion of partisanship may have resulted in favor of the party of which the Senator is an honored member.

Mr. BECK. What I meant to say was that I am opposed to the amendments to this bill as they come from the committee, because they are altogether inefficient in the point in which the system ought to be made efficient. They are inefficient in not protecting the honest pensioner and in allowing the dishonest claimant and the dishonest agent to take advantage of the Government. The men who are sent out by such a measure, the men who are employed to hurry up the cases, are not proper instrumentalities to bring about the good which I desire to see brought about and that I think every Senator desires. We are simply adding to a machinery to hurry up and get through with a great many bad cases, so certified to be by the Commissioner himself, before the proper examination can be had.

I do not care how much money is spent; whether the law was a good one or a bad one, I would pay every honest pensioner every dollar he is entitled to under it, so long as it is the law, because it is the law; but I do desire to have examination made into every case, so that men who are not honest claimants shall not have the money; and I say we have the right to suspect when we find one hundred and seventy odd thousand cases filed last year, as against ten or twelve thousand cases eight years ago, now demanding pensions; and we ought to tell them, "You may be right or you may be wrong, but we must have a thorough examination, and as you have waited this long before you have asserted your claim you must now wait until we have examined fairly whether yours is a good claim or not." The difficulty of examination is much greater now than it would have been if they had applied early; and as they have waited this long it is no hardship that we should make them wait until we have fairly ascertained whether theirs are honest claims or not.

I beg pardon of the Senate for having detained it so long.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not rise for the purpose of reopening this discussion, but merely for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to one or two statements which he made; in fact he has reiterated them time and again; and that we may come to a fair understanding we should understand the law we are discussing. Again, he says that many of the defects in the pension laws should be remedied. I have listened to him time and again on this subject, and at no time has he ever mentioned a solitary one of these defects. I shall be obliged to him if from his seat now he will mention one of them and call my attention to the section. It is a very easy matter for any of us to get up and say this ought to be done or that, but it is better always to give the reason for it.

In the examination of this law before the committee he talks about fraud, and says there has been no way of detecting fraud upon the Treasury. Why, sir, the word "fraud" has been used in this debate from the beginning, and I defy the Senator from Kentucky or any other Senator to show me one solitary instance of a fraud, except as a general statement, that any one has pointed out in this whole debate.

Mr. BECK. Now, will the Senator allow me to say a word there?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. Let us see whether or not, without pretending to specify any individual case, which I would not do if I could, there are frauds. The Commissioner of Pensions uses this language——

Mr. LOGAN. I know the language he uses. That we have discussed over and over.

Mr. BECK. The Commissioner of Pensions says:

> While I do not believe it possible to eliminate from the pension-rolls all the fraudulent claims by any manner of means, yet, considering the whole case, it is my opinion that not less than 10 per cent. of the pension appropriations are paid out upon fraudulent and illegal claims which, by the adoption of a proper method for the preparation and presentation of the evidence in support of the cases, would be saved to the Government and the people.

There is the official statement of the Commissioner.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly. That statement in the Commissioner of Pensions's report has been read time and again, and I have just as often as it has been read asked the Senators who read it, and asked the Commissioner of Pensions, to send us the names of some of these fraudulent claimants. Sir, it is an accusation made in round numbers, based upon suspicion and not upon fact. That there have not been frauds I do not say. In all probability there have been frauds; but let us not speak of it in this wholesale way unless we have some evidence to demonstrate it to the country. I was willing to discuss this proposition as to the pension law fairly with the Senator and see who was wrong in regard to its provisions; and I have asked Senators time and again to point me to one of these sections in the pension law where the power does not exist that the Senator claims should exist for the purpose of detecting fraud. In discussing questions of this kind we should discuss them understandingly. Let us first know what the law is, and then understand how it can be changed in order to apply the remedies for what it is claimed to be wanting in.

Again, the Commissioner of Pensions went before the Committee on Appropriations and said that by changing three words in this law he would have sufficient authority to detect frauds; and in this bill the committee have made the change. What was it? In section 4744 of the Revised Statutes, part of the pension law, it is provided:

> The Commissioner of Pensions is authorized to detail, from time to time, clerks in his office to investigate suspected attempts at fraud.

In that section he wanted the words "suspected attempts" stricken out, and the word "claims" inserted, so that any person in his office might be detailed to do what? Not to investigate frauds but to investigate claims so that he might investigate any and every claim. That provision has been so changed, and that is the only change or modification in the pension law that he asked before that committee unless we wiped out the whole law and gave him a new machine in order that he might have power to run it.

Now, sir, it does seem to me that when Senators make these statements in a wholesale manner they should have something on which to base their statements. If the system is defective, show us its defects before you ask us to change the whole system. It is said it is expensive and therefore this proposition of the Committee on Appropriations should not be adopted. Why, the very machinery which the Senator suggests should be adopted by the Senate, would cost a million and a half of dollars per annum, and I can demonstrate it and did, in the debate prior to this time. There are five hundred and forty officers proposed in your bill, besides the power to increase them up to a thousand, and your bill proposed that they should be paid a sum which would have mounted up to $2,500,000 a year, and yet you object to the expense of $300,000, while you would enact that piece of machinery into a law which would have cost $1,500,000 per annum. So there is nothing in that part of the Senator's argument which in my opinion is worthy of answer.

The Senator further said that everything like the detection of fraud had been voted down in this Senate. Who has voted down any proposition to detect fraud? I have heard of no one. The proposition which the Senator advocates was a cumbersome piece of machinery expensive in all its details, and it was voted down for that reason; but when it comes to the detection of fraud the committee have adopted the very words which the Commissioner of Pensions asks should be adopted in order to give him all the power he desires in reference to the detection of fraud. So on that point the Senator's argument, it seems to me, is not very weighty.

But then he suggests another point, and he has done it on two or three occasions. I cannot understand why he speaks of "this pension craze." What is a pension craze? If there is a mania on the subject of pensions in this Hall, I have not discovered it; but I have discovered that there is a mania on the subject of being adverse to the granting of pensions, and which seems to have seized violent hold of the minds and dispositions of some Senators and some gentlemen. The pension craze is something that I do not understand. I do not understand the meaning of that. A man who is entitled to a pension ought to have it, but a man who is not entitled to it ought not to have it. We are all for that. That is not a craze on either side, but it is a mere matter of getting at the fact as to whether or not the granting of the pension should take place.

The Senator says these pension claims will last longer than the national debt. Why, Mr. President, I hope so. I do hope that the pensions will last longer than the national debt, for I hope the national debt will be paid before all the pensioners are dead. I have too kind a feeling for the pensioners to want them all to die before the national debt is paid. I hope we shall pay the national debt in the next few years. I hope we shall pay the national debt before all the Senators are dead—indeed, before many of them are dead. I think we shall, at least I hope so, and I hope when we do that that when we look over the roll of pensioners there shall not be a blank. I hope they will be living still, many of them at least.

Now, one word in conclusion, in reference to the people being alarmed about this question of pensions. It has been mentioned here by a Senator on my right, and it has been mentioned by a Senator on the left, and all around it has gone, that the immense amount of money which the pensioners are taking will alarm the people.

Mr. BLAIR. I would like to have the Senator explain what he means by a Senator on his right, having made a statement of that kind?

Mr. LOGAN. I understood from a remark the Senator from New Hampshire made this morning in his speech that there would have to be something done or the people would complain about this pension list. That is the way I understood him.

Mr. BLAIR. I certainly think they will complain, but the people will not complain because the pension list is highly enlarged, but they will complain if honest litigants with just claims on the Government are turned away and denied year after year and year after year until death is the only answer they get from any tribunal, if we go on operating under the pernicious system which is now in vogue. That is what I mean. But the people of the United States are more willing to pay their pension debt than any other obligation.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very glad that they are. I hope they are.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not doubt that they are.

Mr. LOGAN. I never questioned it myself; but when Senators talk about pernicious systems, when they utterly fail to point out wherein the system is wanting, I think the use of many words merely to decorate the annals of this country is entirely useless.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator intimate that there has been no pointing out of defects in the existing system so far as the prosecution of claims is concerned?

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senator what I mean.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like very much to know what the Senator means by that if he has any reference to anything I have said. If he is dealing with what may have been said by others, very well.

Mr. LOGAN. I have, I presume, heard what everybody has said in that line, it makes no difference whether the Senator from New Hampshire or not.

Mr. BLAIR. There seemed to be a pointed allusion to the Senator on your right.

Mr. LOGAN. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. BECK rose.

Mr. LOGAN. One at a time.

Mr. BECK. While you are interrupted I thought it was the best time perhaps to interrupt you still further.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. BECK. I know the Senator always bears it very well. I do not want to trouble the Senator, but he asked me about specific cases and I turn to this in the Commissioner's report, page 15, where he says:

> The number of frauds discovered year after year, when it is considered that the attention of the office was attracted to them through accident, or some suspicious circumstance, or by the statement of a volunteer informer, is very great, and renders it certain that but a very small percentage of the frauds committed come to the knowledge of the office.

Mr. LOGAN. We have all read that here.

Mr. BECK. And again, on page 27 of the Commissioner's report, he says:

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880.	Gross savings.
Amount due and unpaid one hundred and fifty-six pensioners whose names were dropped after investigation	$52,180 31
Accrued pension in two hundred and eighty-five claims prima facie established, rejected after investigation	371,031 84
Money illegally drawn as pensions and refunded	28,563 50
Total	451,775 65

These are special cases.

Mr. LOGAN. I know.

Mr. BECK. There was $451,000 that he saved by the accidental detection of frauds, having taken away the money from one hundred and fifty-six fraudulent pension claims and having rejected two hundred and eighty-five claims that were all proved and for the payment of which $28,000 would have been drawn.

Mr. LOGAN. I know that report very well, for I examined it very carefully here. I am about as conversant with it, I expect, as almost any Senator here.

What I was referring to was that Senators fail to refer to the power that the Pension Commissioner has to suspend any case that he suspects, to cut off any pensioner that he suspects, to examine any pensioner that he suspects. Under that power he may as a matter of course under the law as it exists cut off many, but I said that neither the Senator nor any one else had shown the fact so far as any particular instance was concerned. The cutting off of pensioners in the general terms spoken of there is not what I alluded to. I desire to call the Senator's attention to another fact. In the very same statement the Commissioner of Pensions shows that you appropriated $40,000 for his use for the detection of frauds, and that he used but $26,000, and that he left the other $14,000 unused because of the fact that he could find no more frauds.

When you speak about the enormous frauds, the report shows that instead of using the $40,000 which you appropriated to detect the frauds, he could not find them, and used but $26,000. What I complain of is, that it is announced to the country every day that the robbers are in the Treasury with their hammers and their chisels to open its vaults and pour out your money into the hands of the poor pensioner, and that there is no way to check it, when the records show that he failed to use the money appropriated to detect frauds. I say that in my judgment to-day the pension laws, if properly executed, are less faulty than almost any laws on our statute-book.

In relation to desiring the claims of pensioners to be adjudicated readily and promptly, I am as desirous of that as any man. I desire that the pensioner shall have that which is due him; but I am not, as a Senator, going to authorize any wiping out of the laws on the statute-book for the purpose of organizing a new office with machinery for the purpose of experimenting, for the purpose of aggrandizing somebody, when there may be nothing demonstrated in reference to it which is satisfactory as to its usefulness. I am not going to favor that. If you can show me any way by which the pensioner could be aided in obtaining speedy action on his case, I am ready to vote for it; but do not ask me to wipe out laws unless they are pernicious, unless you have the means of showing me how they are pernicious.

I want to answer the suggestion which has been made here time and again about the amount of money which has been used for these poor pensioners. I am sorry the amount is so large, and the reason why I am sorry it is so large is because I am sorry that there are so many men who received wounds in our late war and contracted disease who are entitled to pensions. That is all the reason for my sorrow in this direction and not because of the amount of money. Sir, if there is anything on earth that the Government of the United States should open its vaults and let its money pour out honestly and fairly in a golden stream to satisfy, it is the wants of the old and the decrepid who raised the flag that had been trampled in the dust and held it up so that the breezes of heaven might unfurl it, so that it might be said, "this is the flag of this grand American Union, one and inseparable"—for these men I would pour the money out of the Treasury to appease their wants, their grievances, and their misfortunes.

Sir, when the Senator from Kentucky speaks of the amount of money, let me call his attention to a bill reported here by his committee and now on the table, called the river and harbor bill, which appropriates hundreds of thousands of dollars for the dredging out and opening up of streams that you cannot find on the map of the United States with a magnifying-glass. In fact I do not state this without knowledge, for a Senator in front of me tried it with one of the largest magnifying glasses he could hold in his hand, and he could not find many of them on the map, and Senators who report bills of that class say the pensions are enormous; but money can be thrown into holes, not for political uses, of course; that is not it; not to help my constituents; of course that is not it; not to aid anybody and give contracts; that is not it, of course. What is it for? I do not know. I think perhaps when the bill comes up the ability of the Senator from Kentucky will demonstrate why it is that this amount of money is given. Every spring branch, every duck-puddle, every goose-pond which you can find in the country has its thousands of dollars appropriated to clear it out; for what? For the commerce of nations? Certainly not. For the commerce of what? To help somebody in some district, in some locality, to throw the money into holes to benefit somebody who may want to come to Congress. And yet if the amount of the pension list is extravagant they say that the country is going to be alarmed at it. The country will not be alarmed at it; it may be alarmed at something else, but not at that. The country is not distressed about the amount of money the pensioners get, but it is distressed about that which is expended without any real want or necessity on the part of the Government.

Sir, I hope the time will never come in this country when the poor man who hobbles along the wayside with a crutch bearing him on, sometimes with no arm, and sometimes with one leg, and sometimes both gone, an eye gone or both gone, stooped over and bent down, not by age, but by disease contracted in the service of his country; I hope the time will never come when that man, old or young, lame or halt, or blind, decrepid as he may be, will be turned away when he asks this Government for the pittance that he is entitled to, because in the hour of our dire calamity and struggle, in the hour when the smoke of battle was seen, in the hour when all the powers of humanity seemed to be piled up against the grandest nation of the earth, he came forward to take the risk of his life and raised the pall from this magnificent and grand country of ours, at a time when your mighty temples rocked and reeled and that poor man stretched out his strong arm and steadied the rocking pillars of this mighty structure that you and I might have a place in which we could reside in peace and comfort and be protected by the Constitution and laws. Sir, this grand nation can never agree to the careless thought that will induce us to reach out and take the last crumb that drops from the Government table to feed the poor and distressed whose distress was brought on by wresting the Government from its destroyers. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not know that any explanation of the defects in the present system of adjudicating pension claims will be of the slightest effect. If I should be fortunate enough to show them, the Senator from Illinois would probably when he makes his next speech say that none had been shown. But certainly over and over again during this dicussion it has been stated that the great defect in this system was the ex parte character of the evidence upon which a pension claim must be adjudicated under the law, and the Commissioner over and over again has called attention to that fact. It seems entirely to have escaped the notice of the Senator from Illinois. He can see nothing that the Commissioner says except that the Commissioner thinks there is fraud. Now, I want to eliminate this fraud question from the case. I am not here to talk about fraud. I am here to talk about the right of people who have honest pension claims against this Government, to have them decided in their lifetime. I am not here to ask for any new system for the purpose of investigating frauds. Very possibly the present system is adequate for that purpose or with some very slight changes in the law. But to my mind it is entirely and absolutely inadequate so far as enabling the pension claimant to prove his claim.

I desire to read a few words from a letter submitted by the Commissioner and transmitted to the Senate as recently as February 8, 1881, in which he says:

> The taking of the testimony in public, where the witness is known, before an officer whose duty it is to glean from him the facts, is the most direct and simple method which can be suggested or which has ever been discovered for eliciting the truth upon which questions are to be decided, whether relating to suits in court or to applications for pensions. Such proceedings in the latter class of cases, substituted for the present cumbersome and inadequate system, would doubtless secure a more just and speedy determination of claims, and, at the same time, so far as it is practicable to do, protect the Government against frauds.
> An addition to the force of clerks in the Pension Office of men who have been educated to the law, and who have had practical experience in the consideration of evidence, would hasten the settlement of many of the claims, but no increase in the force, however great, could secure a prompt settlement of all the claims, nor more than a small percentage, representing mainly claims which are supported by a record in the War Department. While it would in some degree reduce the time required for the settlement of the other class of cases, it could not settle them promptly. But partial and inadequate relief can therefore be expected from an increase of the office force.

And in his examination before the committee he says that all he has said is subject to his recommendation contained in his letter which we have in print. Mr. President, to use a homely and familiar phrase, that language of the Commissioner stands to reason. A pension applicant can a great deal better prove his case in the congressional district where his witnesses are, where he is known, where his witnesses are known, where the man can go before an officer of the Government and have the whole truth come out, and know what he wants to prove, the points that he must prove and procure the witnesses to prove them, than by any system of filing affidavits in the Pension Office at Washington. That is the great trouble in this pension system. It is that a pension case can be adjudicated in no way except upon affidavits filed here.

Just take the case of a man who resides in Connecticut, a soldier in humble life who has not the means to employ an attorney, or, if so, who can pay him but a very small sum. He wants to get a pension; he has to commence without a knowledge of what the rules of the office require and justly require to be proved here in Washington; he begins to file affidavits; he gets the affidavit of somebody, and he does not understand the point which he must clearly prove and which he ought clearly to prove. He gets some sort of an affidavit and sends it here to Washington, and very naturally it is not sufficient; very naturally it does not convince the Commissioner of Pensions, as it would not convince one of us Senators. What is the result? Business is behindhand; when that affidavit comes to be examined it is seen clearly that it does not prove the claim, and it is communicated to him that he must have other affidavits. He gets then, but all the while he does not understand the precise thing that he must do and cover by his affidavits.

Then, again, his affidavits are improperly drawn; they are not clearly expressed; they do not touch the point. The applicant finally thinks that he has covered the point, when an examination of the case as filed here in Washington would show that he is very far from it. Then he begins to get discouraged and the case lies along for months. Then it is called up again and then he tries it over again. That is the fault of the system. If that man could go ten or twelve miles to the county seat, or fifty miles even, witnesses in his neighborhood who are interested in him would go with him and if he could find there an examiner of the same character of men that the registers in bankruptcy were, not a man who is there for the purpose of showing how he cannot get his pension but how he can; a man who will tell him what the law is; a man who will tell him what he has got to prove, what his witnesses must prove—then he would bring his witnesses before that man, and they would give their testimony and the examiner would ask them questions not to prevent the getting of the claim but to enable him to get his claim if he has an honest claim.

Mr. PLUMB. May I interrupt the Senator from Connecticut at this point? Why is it that under the present system the Commissioner does not furnish that same kind of hint or suggestion or information to the pensioners?

And let me ask another question. The Senator speaks of an applicant going with his witnesses to the county seat, wherever that may be, for the purpose of making his testimony. What does he say to the people who have left the locality where their witnesses lived and have gone a thousand or fifteen hundred miles away from those witnesses?

Mr. PLATT. Well, to answer the last question first, he can as well obtain his witnesses, if he is a Connecticut man, to go before an examiner in Kansas as he can obtain witnesses in Kansas to go before a justice of the peace or a magistrate. There is no trouble about that.

The other question was why the Commissioner does not tell the applicant what he must do. The Commissioner prints his rules and his regulations and his instructions, and he sends them to the applicant upon request, but the applicant does not know half the time where he can get such things, and when he gets them he is just as badly off as he was before. If I were an applicant for a pension, I would rather attempt to prove the case at my own home among my neighbors by oral testimony than to attempt to prove it by sending affidavits to Washington. That is all there is of this matter. If the Senator from Illinois and others cannot see these defects in the present system, then they will not see but what the present system is all right.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator allow me? I am not here to maintain, and I have not maintained, that the present system is without defects, but this debate has taken a pretty wide range. The present system has not only been arraigned, but it has been arraigned by comparison with some other system, and especially by comparison with that which has been before the Senate and which is known by the name of Senate bill No 496.

In response to my question as to the reason why the Commissioner does not give information, the Senator from Connecticut says in fact he does give information. Let me say to him that I think one of the very worst defects in the administration of the present law, or perhaps it may be in the law itself—I do not say which it is—is, that when the Commissioner is inquired of as to what is necessary to make out a case, he names one or two points, perhaps, in which the testimony is deficient, and that is sent to the claimant and the claimant furnishes that, and when that comes, and in the operation of the system is brought around again to the examiner or the examiner comes to get control of it again, he then finds out that something else is necessary and sends him another statement; and when he furnishes that he waits a certain length of time, and when the case comes around again for consideration, after the lapse of years, he gets another notice of additional testimony required. It is very much as though some man were to go to his physician and say, "I want a prescription," and he was to get a prescription, and then he was to ask him what to do with it, and he was to tell him, "The first thing is to take out the cork," and he was to stop there; and then he would say to him, "My dear sir, what next shall I do?" "Shake the bottle." And by that time probably the man would be so far gone as some of these pensioners are, his wife would be required to write the next letter asking what next should be done? And the reply would probably be, "If the patient is not dead, tell him to take a teaspoonful." And that is the spectacle to-day that is presented in the administration of the pension law. The complaint I have to make about the administration of the law is, that a man is not informed of what is necessary to make his case, unless he gets it on the installment plan in homeopathic doses.

I have a book of the names of several wounded applicants for pensions. Three years ago I commenced making inquiries about them, and in about half the cases that I got answers they were to the effect that their cases had not yet been reached for consideration; as to the remainder, it was stated certain testimony was necessary. When I came back a year later the applicants began to prod me with letters, to make inquiries about their cases. Then I made further inquiries for them, and then another installment of testimony was stated as being necessary. I have been writing letters, to which replies have been made stating that further and further installments of testimony were necessary. In other words, for three years the Commissioner has been stating at intervals what testimony was required instead of stating it all at once; and that requires time, not only on the part of the office, but makes great and grievous delay to the pensioners themselves, who could just as well get all the testimony at once as they can get it in three different installments.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I am not quite used yet to what is called senatorial courtesy, that is when a Senator is making a speech he has to give way to somebody to let a speech be injected. I suppose as I grow older here I shall get fully accustomed to that kind of courtesy; but it is a little difficult to pick up the thread of one's argument just where it is broken off by that means.

Now, I cannot undertake to say whether just the right thing is done in the Pension Office; whether just the information is communicated there which ought to be communicated always; whether it is communicated as fully in response to inquiries as it ought to be; but I can see a great many reasons why all the requirements of the Pension Office will not be communicated at one time. I can see that very possibly the first letter of inquiry is answered by a clerk of one class, who examines the case and thinks that a certain point should be covered, and that after an affidavit has been made to cover that point or has failed to cover that point, the matter is then sent to an examiner, a person of higher grade, the clerk who is finally to pass upon it, and he discovers that the case has not been proved and requires other testimony. All these things are necessary and cannot be avoided under this system of ex parte testimony. The case must be proved. A man who would pass a pension case in the Pension Office without its being fully and completely proved to the satisfaction of a reasonable man would not be fit for his office, and would be just as bad as a man who was attempting to commit a fraud on the Pension Office.

The clerk who first examines a case may not be able to see and communicate in his letter all that will be required in the proof of that case, but the person whose affidavit the applicant is required to produce may not be obtainable by him, and then another class of testimony has to come in. The system is vicious from beginning to end. It is not so well calculated to elicit truth as a system of oral testimony, and I do not believe there is a pension claimant in this country who understands this matter who would not sooner go before an examiner in his own locality and attempt to prove his case than to attempt to prove it by affidavit. I do not say they should all travel to the county seat. Send the examiner to them; send him about the county; send him about the congressional district; let him go into all the large towns and have hearings there. I do not know that Senate bill No. 496 is exactly right, but I do say that in my humble judgment the thing which would prevent pension claimants dying before they got their pensions is to have it so that they can prove the claim in their own localities and not attempt to prove them by affidavits.

Mr. President, a while ago when that bill was first reported to the Senate—May 20, 1880, I see is the date, and it has been sleeping here all this time—I addressed a letter to a man in my own State who I was sure knew a great deal more about the matter than I did, and I have his letter here in reply, which I will ask to have read. We have in Connecticut a law which requires the assistant adjutant-general of the State to act as agent for every person in the State of Connecticut who desires to obtain a pension or a bounty; for eleven or twelve years we have had that agent in the State of Connecticut. He has had large experience in the pension business; the State pays him a salary, and therefore he has no earthly reason to misrepresent this matter. I asked him in last May what he thought of this proposed system, and I have his letter in reply, which I will ask the Secretary to read, and with that I close my remarks.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS, STATE OF CONNECTICUT,
ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Hartford, May 24, 1880.

DEAR SIR: I have carefully examined Senate bill No. 496, "Providing for examination and adjudication of pension claims," and the substitute therefor, and think the bill is one that should be passed by the present Congress.

In my report to the adjutant-general dated December 1, 1879, regarding the collection of pensions through this office, I stated that "the present system of settling pension claims is both slow and liable to great abuses, and by it many just claims are for years unsettled and many fraudulent claims are presented to rob and defraud the Government. The system recommended by the Commissioner of Pensions and now being considered by Congress is one that it seems to me must meet the views of every honest friend of the soldier and one that will expedite the settlement of all just claims. By this system the exact truth can easily be learned, honest claims quickly adjusted, and fraud defeated."

I can now merely reiterate what I have already said as above, and to say that every month increases my desire to see some such change made in the law.

I consider it of the greatest importance that the Pension Department should be brought as near as possible to the claimants and their witnesses. There are many honest claimants that become discouraged trying to obtain just the testimony which the Department is obliged to require; but if an agent of the Department was in the district and the witnesses brought before him, I have no doubt that satisfactory evidence could be obtained to warrant a favorable settlement of the claim.

In the case of fraudulent claims I think it is easy to see that any attempts at perjury would be quickly perceived and that such claims would be immediately put aside, and thus cease to be a bar to just claimants by clogging the files of the office.

It seems natural that many who are now interested in the pension business, and those whose claims will not bear close investigation, should object to any bill which will bring the Pension Office in close connection with the claimant and his witnesses, but I cannot see how any rightful claimant can possibly be injured by the passage of the bill contemplated.

I have been connected with this office and in my present position for eleven years, and during that time have given considerable time and attention to the presentation of claims for soldiers and their heirs, this office acting as attorney in all such cases without fees.

I firmly believe that the Commissioner of Pensions is doing all in his power to expedite the settlement of all just claims and at the same time protect the interests of the Government, and to my mind any bill which will bring him in close connection with the claimants will be for the interest of all concerned.

Very respectfully,

SIMEON J. FOX,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Hon. O. H. PLATT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Since yesterday, about this time or a little earlier, we have made no progress on this bill, not, I think, ten lines. There are less than twenty pages left, and I do not know that there is a question but that the Senate will agree to the amendments of the committee yet to be acted on. I hope we can go on regularly and finish the bill; and I am going to ask the Senate to remain here to-night until we finish it, and not take a recess as usual. I think we can finish it within an hour, and give fair consideration to it, unless some gentlemen wish to discuss this subject further. I want to say that, so far as I know, no amendment has been offered, and yet we have been since this time yesterday discussing, not this bill, but the discussion has proceeded entirely upon another bill, not germane, and not belonging to this bill. I hope we shall proceed now with the appropriation bill regularly.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate. I cannot talk quite as loud nor quite as long as some of our Senators who were soldiers during the war, but I try to work for the soldiers as much as I can. I spend a good deal of my time in that direction. If I made speeches as long as some that are made here, I should repeat the speeches, as has been done here.

It is clear to me that it would have been an easy thing on the part of the Senate to have amended and passed the sixty-surgeons bill, and thereby brought the soldier in close communication with the Pension Department. I know from absolute experience that that is the difficulty; and all the vast amount of money which we are appropriating now will simply pile up the work in the Pension Bureau, with all the cases which have passed the Surgeon-General's Office and the Adjutant-General's Office, and the great difficulty which is in the way now will remain in the way still. Senators may try to defeat the measure as much as they please, but when they undertake to answer arguments of that kind they go precisely over the same ground that has been gone over, and say that no objection has been made to existing laws.

As I said before, I do not propose to occupy the time of the Senate, for I should have to repeat myself, and there has been enough repeating done on this floor. I prefer to work for the soldiers rather than to talk for them. The Senator from Illinois smiles. I have no objection to the Senator from Illinois smiling at what I say, and I have no objection to the Senator from Illinois knowing that I refer to his speeches on the subject. Several times he has made the same argument. He has got up here repeatedly and said that no reason had been given for the passage of the sixty-surgeons bill; he has intimated two or three times that the sixty-surgeons bill—and he said so once distinctly—had been voted down by the Senate. Now, I tell the Senator and I tell the Senate that that bill has never been voted upon at all, and his statement is incorrect. It was ruled out of order. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] intimated that the sixty-surgeons bill did not meet the approval of the Senate, or words to that effect. I said to him that he made a misstatement not intentionally, nor does the Senator from Illinois make it intentionally, but they have made a mistake. They do not know whether the sixty-surgeons bill will meet the approval of the Senate or not because they would not allow it to come to a vote.

It is a fact known to every Senator here, and is in exact accordance with what I said, as other Senators have urged, that the great necessity for the passage of the sixty-surgeons bill was to enable the soldiers to be brought into immediate contact with the Pension Bureau. I tell you that I know, as well as a man can know anything which has not been demonstrated positively, that the great opposition to this bill has been brought about by the claim agents of this country. The pensioner or the applicant for a pension pays claim agents whose interest it is to have the claims as long unsettled in the Pension Bureau as possible. That is my doctrine upon the subject exactly. That is the way I see it and the way I believe it, and I think that is the way the country looks at it.

Mr. LOGAN. I dislike very much at any time to have to reply to remarks of the character of those made by the Senator from Rhode Island. If he in his majesty and power can prevent any one from smiling, I should like to know under what rule of the Senate it is to be done.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I do not want to prevent the Senator from doing so; but I have a right to comment upon it.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course, but that I have not the right to smile in the Senate Chamber is something I did not know before. I thought it was a compliment to a Senator when he was talking for another gentleman to smile at him, but it seems not to be. In all kindness to the Senator from Rhode Island, I would say to him that if he cannot answer an argument in any better way than by these little flings, it is not my fault. I have no objection to his saying that another Senator has been repeating himself. I think if I were to make the same speech over again a hundred times my friend would get information every time from the same speech and his knowledge would be increased; the oftener I talk, the more knowledge he will have.

So far as claim agents are concerned, that insinuation was made by the Senator once before. I have certainly the kindliest feelings for him. Why he makes the insinuation I do not know. All I have got to say to him or any other Senator or anybody else who insinuates that I am actuated by the interests of any claim agent is, that his insinuation is utterly and baselessly false.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Until the Senator from Illinois dropped that last remark I had made up my mind not to say anything more; but I will say that I do not consider the Senator from Illinois immaculate, or myself, either. I have been influenced in my time, and I have been influenced in the wrong direction, too, and very much influenced. I know there are highly respectable claim agents here, who command the attention of the people. They have commanded my attention. One of them commanded my attention this very day, and made me listen to him for half an hour. In the main, I have great respect for him, but he is looking out for his business. I had respect enough for him to give him half an hour's attention. I do not mean to say that I have not been influenced by the presentation made by claim agents; but I say that these claim agents in a body have opposed the pasage of the sixty-surgeons bill, and I do not mean it as an uncomplimentary thing when I say that the Senator from Illinois has been influenced by it, in my opinion. I do not make the direct assertion. In my opinion, claim agents have had an influence upon Senators. Now, I let that go for what it is worth. If it is offensive to anybody, I do not propose to take it back; I do not mean to offend anybody. I am stating what I think is the bare, simple truth; I believe that it is the truth. The Senator will not mean to say that he sets himself up as beyond the influence of claim agents, but he says that if I say he has been influenced by claim agents, I say what is false. It is very easy for the Senator to say to me that I tell a falsehood; but I say that no man is without influence by contact with his fellow-man for good or evil. We are all subject to influence, and I meant no disrespect to the Senator or anybody else when I made the remark I did, and I do not propose to take it back. I say that the claim agents have had an influence upon this subject in my opinion. The Senator from Illinois can make what he pleases of that.

Mr. LOGAN. I have nothing to say further; I have said my say.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I do not desire to participate in the debate that has been going on, but I desire to say a word or two upon the amendment pending. I think we must take one of two things as settled. One thing that is settled for this Congress is, that we have determined not to adopt a new system in the Pension Office. The next question is, are we to leave the Pension Bureau and the condition of things now existing for nine months to come? That is a practical question, which it seems to me to be our duty to answer. Whether the sixty-surgeons bill was the best possible bill or a better, or the bill suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BLAIR,] is a better one or not it is of no profit on this occasion to discuss, because neither of them can become a law at this session of Congress, and the session of Congress closes on the 4th of March, and legislation closes for nine months.

Then, in the brief time left us, and pending this appropriation bill, is it worth while for us to attempt to do anything to remove the difficulties and embarrassments which surround the Pension Office? If so, it must be in the line of giving more force to that office. No other line seems to me to be open at this time. There must be force enough and efficiency and fidelity in that office or nothing can be accomplished.

I understand, without being very familiar with the routine of proceedings in the office, that applications for pensions encounter difficulties at two stages in the process from the applicant to the completion of the hearing. There is no difficulty in the method of procuring the evidence, the evidence is procured well enough, but there is lack of force to examine that evidence after it is filed. Upon that point there is trouble in the office. Then, there should be more force of examiners. There is another point at which the application for a pension stops, and that is after the papers have been examined and are found complete in form, there is lack of confidence in them in the bureau. How are we to meet that? The Commissioner says that by sending a special messenger to the place of residence of the applicant he could determine in the shortest possible time whether that application which is perfect in form is real and honest. Then give him force to do that.

Supply these two points where the Pension Office is weak, and then if the work does not go on rapidly and efficiently and as honestly as it can be under this system, the difficulty is in a want of efficiency and fidelity in the bureau, and no legislation here, no additional appropriation of money for clerk hire, or enlargement of room and facility will meet that difficulty. That is a difficulty of administration the remedy for which does not lie with us. I do not mean to say that it exists, I only say we should meet the two weak points to which I have alluded, namely, give the Commissioner all the force needed to examine papers that are prepared, and when he finds those papers complete in form, then give him all the force necessary to determine in his mind whether that is an honest application or not. I understand that if he has force enough upon these two points he expresses the opinion that he can rapidly and much more surely and honestly than now accomplish this great work. Then let us with this amendment before us look at it in its application to these two points.

I may not have touched the defect of the present administration, because I confess to no great familiarity with it. It seems to me that at these two points it is that the Commissioner needs additional force, and these it is within our power to remedy, and having done this, we have done all we can do, and the rest lies with the administration; and the executive, not Congress, will hereafter be responsible if there is a want of efficiency and fidelity and work in that office.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1681, after the word "investigate," to strike out "suspected frauds and attempts at fraud as provided by law, forty thousand," and insert "pension cases, one hundred and twenty-five thousand;" so as to read:

For actual and necessary expenses of clerks detailed to investigate pension cases, $125,000.

Mr. TELLER. What is the necessity of confining these examinations to clerks? For instance, suppose it was desired in a distant State like mine, 2,000 miles away, to make an examination, would it not be much better to call in the United States attorney or some public officer?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. This does not change any law that now exists. It is in conformity with what has heretofore existed except that we increase the number and increase the amount. There is no trouble such as the Senator suggests; we do not change the law and the system goes on as usual.

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly; the examinations could be made by the surgeons in the locality.

Mr. TELLER. I understood that one of the reasons the Commissioner gave why he had not discovered the frauds was that he could only detail clerks. That was the statement made on the floor. However, I have not any particular feeling in the matter. I have no doubt the committee considered it carefully.

Mr. LOGAN. There is a direct examination by a surgeon who lives in the State or locality of the applicant or pensioner.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. And the same system will continue.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1691, after the word "telegraphing," to strike out "twenty-six" and insert "fifty-one;" and after the word "dollars," in the same line, to insert "$15,000 of which sum shall be available during the current fiscal year;" so as to make the clause read:

For carpets, maps, furniture, awnings, and repairs of the same; for fuel, gas, and repairing heaters and elevators; engraving and retouching plates; for bounty-land warrants, and printing and binding the same; engraving and printing pension-certificates; and for other necessary expenses of the office, including two daily newspapers, and cost of telegraphing, $51,000; $15,000 of which sum shall be available during the current fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued, and the Secretary read the items of appropriation for compensation for the Patent Office.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. After the bill was reported and printed the Commissioner of Patents appeared before the committee and convinced the committee that there ought to be a slight increase in the provision for his office. In line 1702, I move to strike out "22" and insert "23," giving him one additional examiner for a new class that he is obliged to have. In line 1703, I move to strike out "23" and insert "24;" in line 1704, to strike out "23" and insert "24;" and in line 1706, to strike out "23" and insert "24;" so as to read:

Twenty-three principal examiners, at $2,400 each; twenty-four first assistant examiners, at $1,800 each; twenty-four second assistant examiners, at $1,600 each; twenty-four third assistant examiners, at $1,400 each.

I will state that this office as is known is more than self-sustaining and the committee was convinced that these amendments ought to be made.

The amendments were agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and the Secretary read the total of appropriations for compensation for the Patent Office in lines 1730 and 1731.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In consequence of the amendments just agreed to, the total should be changed from $473,670 to $480,870. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1791, after the word "railroads," to strike out "five" and insert "four;" in line 1793, after the word "engineer," to strike out "three thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred;" and in line 1798, after the word "all," to strike out "eighteen thousand one" and insert "sixteen thousand six;" so as to make the clause read:

Office of Auditor of Railroad Accounts:

For auditor, who shall hereafter be styled commissioner of railroads, $4,000; bookkeeper, $2,400; assistant bookkeeper, $2,000; railroad engineer, $2,500; one clerk, $1,400; one copyist, $900; one messenger, $600; traveling and other expenses, $2,500; incidental expenses, $300; in all, $16,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1822, to increase the appropriation for the compensation of the "surveyor-general of the Territory of Dakota" from $2,000 to $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill, and read to line 1863.

Mr. SAUNDERS. If in order, I move, in line 1849, to increase the appropriation for surveyor-general of Nebraska and Iowa from $2,000 to $2,500. I see all the others are placed at $2,500, and I think it must be a mistake in the print.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill has passed the point to which the Senator calls attention, and if he will reserve his amendment until after the reading of the bill shall have been completed, and the amendments of the committee acted upon, it will be more convenient to the Senate.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Very well; I will wait, then.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 1911, after the word "four," to strike out "eighteen" and insert "nineteen;" in line 1912, after the word "two," to strike out "thirty-seven" and insert "thirty-eight;" in line 1914, after the word "each," to insert "ten female clerks, at $1,200 each;" in line 1915, before the word "female," to strike out "fifty-seven" and insert "forty-seven;" and in line 1918, after the word "and," to strike out "one thousand six" and insert "seven thousand four;" so as to make the clause read:

For Third Assistant Postmaster-General, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,000; chief of division of dead letters, $2,250; chief of division of postage-stamps, $2,250; seven clerks of class 4; nineteen clerks of class 3; twenty-eight clerks of class 2; thirty-eight clerks of class 1; six clerks, at $1,000 each; ten female clerks, at $1,200 each; forty-seven female clerks, at $900 each; three assistant messengers; eight laborers; four female laborers, at $480 each; in all, $207,460.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1927, after the word "dollars," to strike out "four" and insert "five;" in line 1931, before the word "laborers," to strike out "three" and insert "four;" and in the same line, after the word "all," to strike out "forty-nine thousand four hundred" and insert "fifty-one thousand eight hundred and sixty;" so as to make the clause read:

For superintendent of the money-order system, $3,000; chief clerk, $2,000; five clerks of class 4; seven clerks of class 3; five clerks of class 2; nine clerks of class 1; one clerk at $1,000; five clerks at $900 each; one assistant messenger; four laborers; in all, $51,860.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 1975, after the word "interest," to insert "and the proceeds of said sales he shall pay into the Treasury, and make report thereof to Congress;" so as to make the clause read:

That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to sell as waste paper, or otherwise dispose of, the files of papers which have accumulated, or may hereafter accumulate, in the Post-Office Department that are not needed in the transaction of current business and have no permanent value or historical interest; and the proceeds of said sales he shall pay into the Treasury, and make report thereof to Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the following clause, from line 1999 to line 2004, inclusive:

For salaries of the chief justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia and the five associate judges, $24,500: Provided, That hereafter the salaries appropriated for the United States judges in the foregoing paragraphs, and judges of the Court of Claims, may be paid monthly.

Mr. JOHNSTON. In line 2004 I move to insert after the word "claims" the words "and of the Territories," so as to make it apply to the judges in the Territories as well as the judges in the States. There is no reason why the judges in the Territories should not be paid monthly.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I see no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed and continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, after line 2008 to insert:

For salary of the warden of the jail in the District of Columbia, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in line 2039 to reduce the appropriation "for rent of the four floors of the building occupied by the Department of Justice" from $14,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was after the word "dollars," in line 2062, in the items for the Court of Claims, to strike out:

And said sum, as well as the appropriation for like services in the act of June 15, 1880, chapter 225, for the fifteenth volume, may be paid to the reporters of the court notwithstanding section 1765 of the Revised Statutes, or section 3 of the act of June 20, 1874, chapter 328.

So as to make the clause read:

For reporting the decisions of the court, clerical hire, labor in preparing and superintending the printing of the sixteenth volume of the reports of the Court of Claims, to be paid on the order of the court, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to have the amendment just now agreed to in regard to the force of the Pension Office reserved when the bill is reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A separate vote on the amendment will be reserved.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has now been read through as in Committee of the Whole and is open to amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Committee on Appropriations has no further amendment of its own to present. I wish to say that there is one amendment that the committee has been consulted on, and it is one that the Senator from Kentucky or the Senator from Indiana, I do not know which, is going to offer.

Mr. BECK. The Committee on Finance unanimously agreed to offer an amendment which I now submit. The amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and it is agreed to I believe by that committee. After line 52 I move to insert "for clerk to the Committee on Finance, $2,500;" and in line 55 to strike out the words "for clerk to the Committee on Finance." That amendment I think was agreed to by the Committee on Appropriations. It was recommended unanimously by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VOORHEES. The clerk to the Committee on Finance performs the duties that are discharged by three clerks in the House.

Mr. BECK. And he is a stenographer as well.

Mr. VOORHEES. He is a stenographer besides.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is no objection on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am informed by Mr. Clark, the Architect of the Capitol, that there was some damage done to the public grounds west of the Capitol, the Botanic Garden, by the late freshet to the extent of four or five hundred dollars. I therefore move, in line 386, after the words "five thousand," to insert "five hundred;" so as to read:

For improving the garden, procuring manure, tools, fuel, and repairs, and purchasing trees and shrubs, under the direction of the Library Committee of Congress, $5,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. In line 379 I move to strike out "six" and insert "eight;" so as to read:

For Botanic Garden, for pay of superintendent, $1,800.

The superintendent has been there a quarter of a century. He has the pay now of a committee clerk. I know that his duties and labors are worth $1,800 if they are worth anything at all, and I have therefore moved that his pay be increased to that extent.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I wish it understood that these amendments are strictly out of order, but after the bill was reported the committee to some extent examined them. The committee examined what the Senator from Indiana now is offering. I say that in justice to the committee, because there may be amendments offered that the committee have not considered and which are out of order, and I want it understood that we are admitting these amendments although they are strictly out of order, because they have been heretofore considered by the committee since the bill was reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. In order to complete the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, in line 382, the total of the appropriations should be changed from $11,500 to $11,700. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. On line 34, after the word "dollars," I move to insert "one messenger, $1,440." In the same line, after the word "dollars," I move to strike out the words "two messengers" and insert in lieu thereof "one messenger," striking out the word "each" after "$1,296," so that there will be one messenger at $1,440 and one messenger at $1,296.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I understand that there are two messengers now in the Secretary's office. One of them is the one known as "Joe," whom we all know.

Mr. BUTLER. McGuckian is his name.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The other is the financial messenger, who has to attend generally to carrying the money between the office of the financial clerk and the Treasury. If the salary of one of those messengers is increased that of the other ought to be.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not the slightest objection to that.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The committee considered this amendment also, and while it was not inserted in the bill by the committee there was a partial understanding that it might be offered in the Senate. I only mention this so as to bring it in order on the bill. The financial messenger who goes between here and the Treasury Department is just as deserving as the other. Last year the Senator from Indiana will recollect that he specially added an extra compensation for that man.

Mr. HARRIS. Let them both go in at $1,440.

Mr. BECK. They are the only two men who do that class of work who are not full messengers of the Senate, and they ought both of them to have the full pay of a messenger.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to make them both full messengers.

Mr. McDONALD. That would make their compensation uniform with other messengers.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir. In line 35 I move to strike out "two" and insert "four," and to strike out "ninety-six" and insert "forty;" so as to read:

Two messengers, at $1,440 each.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If Senators will just allow us to propose the amendments it will be better. I think my friend from Tennessee is wrong in what he wants to strike out. We can amend the bill and foot up the total, and probably, I think, get it more correct.

Mr. HARRIS. The totals would necessarily follow. The items make up the totals. I do not think I am wrong, but I shall certainly defer to the Committee on Appropriations if the Senator wishes.

Mr. BUTLER. With the understanding that the committee will put in the amendment increasing the pay of these two messengers, putting them on a par with the other messengers, I have nothing, of course, to say about the amendment I suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina withdraws the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. With the understanding I have indicated, of course.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that they both be made full messengers, striking out "two" and inserting "four"——

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There will be no trouble about that. In line 35 I move to strike out "two" and insert "four," and to strike out "ninety-six" and insert "forty;" so that the whole clause will read:

Two messengers, at $1,440 each.

Mr. BUTLER. That is it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The total must now be corrected. In lines 16 and 17 it must be changed from $207,451.26 to $207.739.26. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. In line 464, after the word "Treasury," I move to strike out "seven" and insert "fifteen;" so as to read:

For printing and distributing the publications by the Department of State of the consular and other commercial reports, including circular letters to chambers of commerce, provided that such publications may be sold at such rates as may be fixed by said Department, and the proceeds of all sales to be paid into the Treasury, $15,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama that I intended to offer a similar amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa to move his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I shall object to enlarging the appropriation.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will yield to the Senator from Alabama and allow him to offer it.

Mr. MORGAN. These are very important publications, by all odds the most valuable documents that are published.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the amount ought to be $20,000, and I am sorry that the chairman of the committee objects to it; but if he does, I shall not press it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The estimate is $7,000.

Mr. MORRILL. I know the Senator from West Virginia is too good an economist to be opposed to an amendment of this character. He would destroy his entire reputation.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is my duty to take care of this bill, and I shall do so notwithstanding the complimentary remarks of my friend from Vermont. I think $15,000 is ample for the purpose.

Mr. MORGAN. I have moved an amendment to increase the appropriation to $15,000.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 459 I move to insert "monthly," so as to read:

For printing and distributing monthly the publications by the Department of State, &c.

The word "quarterly" was stricken out by the committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suggest to my colleague on the committee that as the clause now stands the Department can issue publications as often as they choose, monthly if they choose, or semi-monthly.

Mr. ALLISON. I think we had better have them monthly.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I have no objection to it if the Senator thinks the publications can be made monthly.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert "monthly" in line 459.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAUNDERS. In line 1849, after the word "Iowa," I move to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,500;" so as to read:

For surveyor-general of Nebraska and Iowa, $2,500.

All the other surveyors-general get $2,500, and I think it must be a mistake that this one is left at $2,000.

Mr. ALLISON. It is not a mistake.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No; it is not a mistake.

Mr. SAUNDERS. In all the Territories, I think, and in Oregon, Nevada, and Colorado the surveyors-general get $2,500.

Mr. ALLISON. We have been winding up Nebraska for some time, and there is very little work to do.

Mr. SAUNDERS. There is an increased business this season by reason of a survey of what are called pasture lands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I shall raise the point of order on the amendment. It is not estimated for. We have given the full estimate. The reason, I suppose, why the salary of some of the other surveyors-general is greater than this is because this is for a State and others are for Territories where there is a great deal of public land.

Mr. SAUNDERS. In Nevada and Oregon the surveyors-general are put at $2,500.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But there is a great deal more work done there; that is the representation to us, and we believe it to be correct. We have given the full estimate, and having given the full estimate, as the point of order is raised, the amendment is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will not raise the point of order on this amendment. Other gentlemen have offered amendments, and there has been an increase all the way until I have offered one. I hope I am not to meet a point of order every time raised by the Senator from West Virginia when others have not been so treated.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Of course I ought to reply very promptly to the Senator from Nebraska. He says I have not raised the point of order upon other amendments. I have twice or three times stated that amendments offered by Senators had been considered by the committee. The Senator is mistaken when he says that I have not raised the point of order on other Senators.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know how much consideration was given to this subject by the committee, but I never was questioned on it, and I know that there is an increased amount of business to be done, and that there is still the winding up of the business in Iowa. Since the office has been changed from Iowa to Nebraska it covers the business of both States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate is not in order if the Senator from West Virginia insists on his point of order.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hope the Senator will not insist on his point of order on this amendment, because I think it is right to increase the salary from $2,000 to $2,500.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If I do not insist upon this I shall have to give way to all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is not in order.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to an amendment on line 1661 which I have sent to the desk, and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The SECRETARY. In line 1661, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert:

Three assistant surgeons to medical referee, $2,000 each.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator sees that that is new matter entirely.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. I offered it yesterday.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. But it is a change of the existing law.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg the Senator's pardon, it is not a change of the existing law. I say to the Senator he is mistaken. It is the simplest proposition in the world. The medical referee under the law has three assistants, and the law provides that the three assistants shall be borne on the roll as clerks of the fourth class. You have added twenty examiners at $2,000 each, and increased the pay of the medical referee, but you do not allude to these three assistants in this bill at all. They are not provided for, but left merely to be paid as fourth-class clerks. My amendment merely changes their salary.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The fact, as I understand it, is that there are three fourth-class clerks provided for by law who are assistant medical referees. They are provided for in this bill, but they are called clerks, and the law calls them clerks. The Senator wishes to change them from clerks to assistant referees, and to increase their salaries from $1,800 to $2,000.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will let me read the law, he will see that he is mistaken:

SEC. 4776. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to appoint a duly qualified surgeon as medical referee, who, under the control and direction of the Commissioner of Pensions, shall have charge of the examination and revision of the reports of examining surgeons, and such other duties touching medical and surgical questions in the Pension Office as the interests of the service may demand; and his salary shall be $2,500 per annum. And the Secretary of the Interior is further authorized to appoint such qualified surgeons (not exceeding four) as the exigencies of the service may require, who may perform the duties of examining surgeons when so required, and who shall be borne upon the rolls as clerks of the fourth class; but such appointments shall not increase the clerical force of said bureau.

These men are assistant medical referees, but denominated and borne on the rolls as fourth-class clerks. You have now changed the force and employed twenty examiners. These men are designated as assistant medical referees, but they are of course on the roll as fourth-class clerks. The amendment does not effect their being borne on the roll, but it increases their salaries. It is not proposed to change them on the roll, but merely to increase their salaries to $2,000 per annum.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. If the amendment of the Senator from Illinois prevails we should have to strike out three clerks.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Certainly; you increase the number in the office otherwise. The Senator is mistaken. I think the law which he read says that there shall be a medical referee and three assistant surgeons borne on the roll as fourth-class clerks, which they are, and we provide for them in that way in this bill. The bill carries out the law as to them. If we advance their salary you must change their name.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. You leave them on the roll, call them what you please, and you give these three surgeons $2,000 instead of $1,800; that is all. They still stand on the roll. It does not change the law. It only changes their salaries; that is all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator proposes to change their name.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I do not think this is a good thing to do. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Pensions have been several times before the committee and made full statements. They went over the bill and we fixed it as they wanted it, and we have named these officers in accordance with law. I shall have to make the point of order on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course if the Senator insists that it is just to raise the salaries of everybody else in that Department except these three surgeons I have nothing further to say. They are not clerks. They are three men who are duly qualified surgeons, and as good as any in the Department. They have been there for years as surgeons. Of course they are paid on the roll as clerks, but they are surgeons, assistant medical referees, and their duty is as surgeons to examine the rating rolls. They do not perform any clerical duty; they examine the rolls as to the rating of pensioners according to the disability incurred from wounds or disease, and they are well qualified men, just as well qualified as the medical referee. You pay the medical referee $2,500 because he is called medical referee; that is, he stands at the head of these surgeons. The other three are his assistants, and perform the duty, he being the chief officer, and you pay them $1,800 apiece. I want to know where is the justice in that? I do not propose to take them off the roll, but let them stay on the roll as the law says, and increase their salary. I designate them as the three surgeons assisting the medical referee in order that they may be known as the persons who are to get the $2,000. It does not change the law a particle; it only changes the salary, leaving the law as it is. It leaves these officers on the roll, but gives them $2,000 apiece, which is just the same as you give your examiners who examine the evidence in a case. Why should it not be done? These are three good surgeons, good men.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I know nothing of them.

Mr. LOGAN. I do. When I say I know of the men, I mean I know their duties, I know who they are. They are nothing to me. I only know them by going into the office on business, but I know what their duties are, for I have inquired into the subject. I have made a good deal of inquiry about the Pension Office, I will say to the Senator, and I know that these men ought really in justice to be paid as much as the medical referee. They would be perfectly satisfied, however, to have their salaries made equal to those of the other examiners, for these are examiners, only they are medical examiners instead of examiners of evidence, and when you increase the compensation of the other examiners to $2,000 their compensation ought to be increased also. I suppose if the attention of the committee had been called to the fact, they would have been so put on the roll, but attention was not called to it. I think it is right, and I do not think the Senator ought to object.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hardly think we ought to change salaries in this way, and also change the designation of these employés, unless on consultation with the Department. We have given exactly what the estimates ask for, and we have called these officers just what the law calls them, and if the Senator calls them anything else he must change the law, for the law designates them as fourth-class clerks and says they shall be paid $1,800 a year. I dislike to raise the point of order, but it is my duty to do it. I must protect the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator makes this point of order on the amendment providing for these three men, the only ones who are not provided for in this bill. You raise the salary of the Commissioner to $5,000, his deputy to $4,000, and you go through that office and raise the salary of nearly every officer in it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, no.

Mr. LOGAN. All except these three medical referees were raised. The salary of the medical referee, the salary of the deputy commissioner, and of everybody except these three medical referees, is increased by this bill, and now the Senator raises the point of order on this amendment, when they only want an increase of $200 apiece to make them equal to the examining clerks. That is the fact.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia insist on the point of order?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WALLACE. On line 491 I move to strike out "two" and insert "four," so as to read:

One captain of the watch, $1,400.

This is a most important officer. He has the control of sixty men in the Treasury Department, and gets but $1,200. There is an estimate in his favor and a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in its support, and it seems to me he ought to have it. He has the entire control of the whole Department every night with sixty men under his charge. Twelve hundred dollars seems to me to be entirely too small for his services.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope the Senator will not insist on that. He is the best paid captain of the watch now in any Department.

Mr. WALLACE. And he has the largest responsibility. A man who has sixty men under his charge, who has entire care of the Treasury Department every night in the year, and all the responsibility, ought to have more than $1,200.

Mr. LOGAN. Is this not out of order?

Mr. WALLACE. It is in pursuance of the estimates, and comes here with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hardly think it ought to be done. I leave it to the Senate, though.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The total will have to be changed.

Mr. WALLACE. Add $200 to the total.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I gave notice some time ago that I intended to reserve a separate vote on the amendment from lines 1570 to 1579. Looking over the Senate I am not sure that if I were to record my own vote in opposition to that amendment I should not embarrass the passage of this bill, because I am not sure that there is a quorum present. I therefore shall not ask to reserve that amendment; but I desire to say that I am utterly and entirely opposed to that provision for additional examiners in the Pension Office and about one hundred and forty-one additional clerks. I called attention to it for the purpose of recording my vote against it; but it appears that I should embarrass the committee by so doing, because there might not be a quorum here. In my opinion there is no necessity for any such increase, and no possible good can result from it. I believe there ought to be a thorough revision of the pension system, and I would vote for $100,000 or for a million of dollars in a matter of economy for the purpose of having a thorough revision and detection of everything wrong in the pension-rolls. I would not deprive any pensioner properly entitled of the pension which he is drawing under the law, but I do not believe any good result will come from this large increase of force. It is an increase of the expenses of that office of over three hundred thousand dollars. I make my protest now so that I may be on record against that amendment offered by the committee. I would call for the yeas and nays and record my own vote against it, except that I do not desire to obstruct business by showing the absence of a quorum.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to give notice that to-morrow at half past one o'clock I will call up the bill (H. R. No. 6529) making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes. I think it will not take much time.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. BUTLER. I desire to say that I did not insist on my right this morning to submit some remarks to the Senate on the river and harbor bill. I will ask the permission of the Senate to-morrow morning, after the morning business, to occupy perhaps ten minutes.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1479) to authorize the President to appoint Ordnance-Sergeant William Marshall, United States Army, a second lieutenant, and place him upon the retired list, to report it adversely; and I move that the bill be indefinitely postponed on the ground that the Senate has already passed a general bill providing for the retirement of sergeants, and it would not be just to pass a special bill.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if the committee are reporting against all special cases?

Mr. COCKRELL. Against all special cases. I move that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 470) to provide for an investigation and examination of the accounts of certain land-grant railroads in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court, and for a full report of the results thereof to Congress, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Select Committee to examine into the circumstances connected with the removal of the Northern Cheyennes from the Sioux reservation to the Indian Territory, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 2169) to provide for the settlement of the Ponca tribe of Indians, and for other purposes relating to their welfare, reported it with amendments.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call up the unfinished business, the Library bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, being Senate bill No. 1988, authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 22, 1881.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHOCTAW CLAIM.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent yesterday during the roll-call on the bill with reference to the Choctaw claim. Had I been here, I should have voted against referring that matter to the Court of Claims.

PENSION BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair yesterday gave notice that he would this morning ask the House to take from the Speaker's table six pension bills of the House which have been returned from the Senate with amendments, and which the Chair thought should have opportunity for consideration that they may be passed. If there be no objection the Chair will present those bills to the House now.

There was no objection.

WILLIAM BOWMAN.

The bill (H. R. No. 2290) granting a pension to William Bowman was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate read, as follows:

Strike out all after "month," in line 4, to the end of the bill, and insert "subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws."

The amendment was concurred in.

SAMUEL B. HUTCHINSON.

The bill (H. R. No. 3100) granting relief to Samuel B. Hutchinson was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "directed," in line 2, down to and including the word "and," in line 3. In line 3 strike out "her." In line 3, after the word "guardian," insert "of Mary Ann Shurlock." In line 4 strike out "her." Strike out all after "1871," in line 6, down to and including "death," in line 7, and insert "until the death."

The amendment was concurred in.

HULDA L. BARNARD.

The bill (H. R. No. 192) granting a pension to Hulda L. Barnard was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate read, as follows:

In line 5 strike out "January 10, 1877," and insert "after the passage of this act." In line 7 strike out "in his life-time," and insert "at the time of his death."

The amendment was concurred in.

ROBERT S. GOODALL.

The bill (H. R. No. 624) granting a pension to Robert S. Goodall was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate read, as follows:

Strike out all after "pension-rolls" to the end of the bill, and insert "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was concurred in.

ALBERT L. JACK.

The bill (H. R. No. 2123) granting a pension to Albert L. Jack was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate read, as follows:

Amend the title so as to read: "An act granting a pension to Albert N. Jack."

The amendment was concurred in.

ROSALIE LOUIS.

The bill (H. R. No. 4887) granting a pension to Rosalie Louis was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate read, as follows:

Strike out all after line 4 to the end of the bill.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to reconsider the votes by which these amendments of the Senate have been concurred in; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN R. WALLACE.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6848) granting a pension to John R. Wallace, and that the same be now put on its passage. It is a very meritorious bill, and there will be no objection to it.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of John R. Wallace, late member of Union Guards of Davis County, Iowa, at the rate of $24 per month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. WEAVER. There is a unanimous report in favor of this bill.

There being no objection, the bill was taken up, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WEAVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALDERSON T. KEENE.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 5713) for the benefit of Alderson T. Keene, and that it be now put on its passage. There is a unanimous report from the Committee on War Claims in favor of this bill. It proposes to repay to a gallant Union soldier money expended by him for the benefit of soldiers in his command during the war.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury unappropriated, the sum of $325, to Alderson T. Keene, late first lieutenant of Company E, First Kentucky Cavalry, in the late war, the same being for forage and rations furnished by him in 1862 for a detachment of soldiers under his command, while in the service of the United States.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to consider the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. DAVIS.

Mr. PACHECO. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 6860) for the relief of William H. Davis, and that the bill be now put upon its passage.

Mr. SAMFORD. I demand the regular order.

Mr. VALENTINE. I hope the regular order will not be demanded. That proceeding is getting rather stale. As soon as the Speaker comes from that side of the House to this some gentleman over there demands the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has gone from side to side.

Mr. VALENTINE. I know that. I am not imputing any blame to the Chair, but I appeal to gentlemen on the other side to be fair toward us on this side. It has happened very often that as soon as the Chair has left that side of the House to come to this the regular order has been called.

The SPEAKER. When that happens, the Chair, in resuming recognition of requests for unanimous consent, begins where he had stopped.

Mr. SAMFORD. The gentleman from Nebraska has no right to make such remarks.

Mr. VALENTINE. I do not make the remark particularly to that gentleman; but I speak to that side of the House, and I say it is a fact that as soon as the Speaker comes to this side of the House to recognize requests for unanimous consent, some gentleman rises on the other side and calls for the regular order. I appeal to the RECORD as proof of the fact.

Mr. BRAGG. I do not think gentlemen on this side have succeeded in getting any more measures through by unanimous consent than gentlemen on the other. In my neighborhood the complaint is that certain gentlemen leave their seats and come down to the center for the purpose of obtaining recognition.

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I come down the main aisle into the area in front of the Speaker's chair every day in the vain hope of recognition.

The SPEAKER. It does not help gentlemen to leave their seats and crowd down into the area.

Mr. SAMFORD. I demand the regular order of business.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUBBELL. I present a conference report, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 4, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: After the word "home," in line 3 of said amendment, insert the words "upon security given to the satisfaction of the managers;" in line 4, after the word "pensioners," insert the words "without deduction for fines or penalties;" and in line 10 strike out all after the word "or" to the close of the paragraph and insert the words "and children, or in default of either, to his legal representatives;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out of said section the words "and for other purposes" and insert the words "deficiencies and" before the word "other" in line 4 of the bill; and that the Senate agree to the same.

JAY A. HUBBELL,
WILLIAM H. FORNEY,
J. A. McMAHON,
Managers on the part of the House.
NEWTON BOOTH,
R. E. WITHERS,
W. B. ALLISON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The statement accompanying the report under the rules, will now be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The effect of the report if adopted will be as follows:

By amendment numbered 1, the House abandons the provision concerning Indian pensions.

By amendment numbered 4, the provisions concerning payment to pensioners who are inmates of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers are more carefully drawn with a view to the greater protection of the pensioners and their legal representatives.

By amendment numbered 5, the title of the bill is corrected to read as follows: "A bill (H. R. No. 6532) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for deficiencies, and for other purposes."

The report was adopted.

Mr. HUBBELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins for the reception of reports from committees.

Mr. SCALES. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the morning hour be dispensed with for this day.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope that will not be done. There are appropriation bills yet to be considered by the House, and we will get along much faster by using the morning hour in the reception of reports from committees.

Mr. SCALES. I hope the morning hour will be dispensed with. It will only occupy an hour in motions to suspend the rules.

Mr. ROBINSON. If we go on with the regular order it will take but a short time to get into committee on the appropriation bills.

Mr. SCALES. I insist on my motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 74, noes 52.

So the motion to dispense with the morning hour was disagreed to, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports are in order beginning with the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from New York to the fact that no written report accompanies this bill as is required by the rule of the House.

Mr. LAPHAM. I will furnish the report during the course of the day. This bill has been reported with the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether the points of order have been reserved upon this bill or not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I reserve all points of order upon it.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COVERT. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill; and pending that motion I move that all debate upon the paragraph under consideration and pending amendments be limited to one minute.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion of Mr. COVERT, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, was then agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. COX in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Machinery, apparatus, and experiments in the manufacture of sugar:

For expenses of machinery and apparatus, labor, &c., to continue experiments in the manufacture of sugar from sorghum and other sugar-producing plants,

$25,000, to be available immediately; and out of the above sum the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to pay the chief chemist $1,000 as additional compensation for the next fiscal year.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon that clause appropriating $1,000 extra compensation to be paid to the chief chemist.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. McMILLIN. It changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. WEAVER. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. VALENTINE. The point of order is certainly not well taken, because it is the existing law at this time.

Mr. COVERT. I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, in response to the point raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, that this bears the same phraseology that was embodied in the law of last year. Therefore the point of order cannot lie against this provision, as it does not change existing law. It is simply an embodiment of the law of last year covering the same point into this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does this item increase expenditure?

Mr. COVERT. Not a dollar.

Mr. McMILLIN. The existing law fixes the salary of the chemist. He was given a thousand dollars extra last year, as it is proposed also to give him a thousand dollars this year, but whether it be for additional salary or not is not stated. It is, however, for additional compensation. I insist that the donation to him of a thousand dollars last year does not change the law which fixes the salary, and is no reason for its incorporation in the present bill. Therefore I make the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled in other cases that an appropriation act was a law for such matters, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:
"That $10,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the continuation of experiments in connection with the manufacture of sugar from beets and for the cultivation of beets for that purpose."

Mr. HATCH. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please state his point of order.

Mr. HATCH. I make the point of order that the amendment changes existing law, and does not retrench expenditures.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. Of course I admit what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] says in so far as it contemplates an increase of the appropriation. In the one minute to which that debate is limited on this paragraph I cannot say what I desire to say in regard to this industry. But I believe it is an industry of such importance, not only to the farmers of this country but to everybody in this land, that the gentleman from Missouri ought to withdraw the point of order and allow a vote to be taken by this committee upon that amendment.

Several years ago the people of my State became so much interested in the production of the sugar-beet that the Legislature made an appropriation to encourage the farmers to enter upon its growth. The results were very satisfactory, so much so that capitalists invested their money in the erection of mills for the manufacture of sugar from the beets. This amendment is only intended to encourage the production of the beets by the farmers of the country for the manufacture of sugar and to stop this drain of millions and millions of dollars from the consumers of sugar in this country.

Is it possible in this land of ours, possessing every variety of soil and climate, producing everything for the wants of man, we cannot produce such sugar as we can eat, when in Germany, in France, and other countries of Europe not half so well blessed, not half so highly favored as this land of America, sugar is produced at less than one-half of the cost to the inhabitants than it is in America. If our Agricultural Department is worth anything, if it is to be of any benefit to the farmers of this country, or to the people generally of this country, let it direct its efforts in this direction and it seems to me we will then obtain results which will be commensurate with the expenses that the Government is now incurring in this behalf.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire to speak on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled on it.

Mr. HASKELL. Does the Chair sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes sir.

Mr. HASKELL. Then, feeling the necessity of having this question settled definitely, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair; and upon that appeal I desire to say a word or two.

Mr. BRAGG. The gentleman from Kansas suggests that he is about to speak on the appeal. I make the point of order that appeals from the decisions of the Chair are not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. Appeals are not debatable; but the Chair would like to hear the gentleman.

Mr. HASKELL. I take it appeals are debatable under the fourth section of the first rule of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HASKELL. I desire the attention of the Chair because the decision of the point of order made against this amendment is of infinite importance to every lover and friend of the development of the agricultural interests of this country. Mr. Chairman, the organic law organizing the Bureau of Agriculture provides for precisely these things contemplated by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware, and other amendments looking to an investigation of these subjects and these objects, directing the Commissioner of Agriculture to do these very things. This is one of the purposes of this bill. It needs no law to authorize the Commissioner of Agriculture to go on with these experiments; no law at all. All that he needs is the money. He is already authorized by law to prosecute these experiments. He is already clothed with authority to do the work.

The intent of the rule is to bar an appropriation of money when an officer of the Government for whom it is to be appropriated has not the authority to act. In this case this officer of the Government has the authority to act. He is authorized by law to act on this and on all kindred subjects; he is empowered and commanded to act. All that he needs is a bare appropriation of money for the specific purpose and no change of law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when I read the import lists of this country and find that sixty million dollars' worth of sugar is imported annually into this country, and when a proposition is made to continue the investigation of the processes by which it is hoped to utilize the broad fields of sorghum and the fields of beet that may be cultivated in this country, in view of the success that has crowned the efforts of agriculturists in France in this direction, I deem it a measure of importance sufficient to warrant at least the attention and the deliberate judgment of this House upon the subject.

Upon the point of order to which I now address myself I feel thoroughly assured that it does not properly lie against this amendment; and with all kindliness of feeling to the Chair, believing if this and kindred amendments are to be ruled out from this bill, that by a point of order you cripple a department of infinite value to the country and cripple researches in a very important regard and direction, I have been led to take this appeal.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Kansas allow me to ask whether there was a special appropriation made by Congress for the purpose of authorizing the Commissioner of Agriculture to prosecute investigations with reference to the culture of tea in this country or whether he is prosecuting those investigations under the general appropriations?

Mr. HASKELL. I think he is prosecuting that investigation under a general appropriation.

Mr. ANDERSON. In regard to the culture of tea?

Mr. HASKELL. Yes; though I do not know about that.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is under a special appropriation.

Mr. SPRINGER. What was the appropriation?

Mr. COVERT. There was an appropriation made last year for the purpose.

Mr. HASKELL. The very terms of the law which gives the Commissioner a chemist and a laboratory is an authorization to him to use that chemist and that laboratory; and if he chooses to use it in experiments upon beets or sorghum, who shall say nay? This amendment is to give to him some money to prosecute this important research; and shall it be ruled out of order under the twenty-first rule as in violation of law when it is in the direct line of the command of the law?

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. COVERT] whether the special appropriation for experimenting in the culture of tea was in a general appropriation bill?

Mr. HASKELL. Let me read the section of the organic act authorizing this Department:

The Commissioner of Agriculture shall procure and preserve all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by means of books and correspondence, by practical and scientific experiments, &c.

Now, this amendment is to give him some money to continue his practical and scientific experiments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. How much time has been occupied by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL?]

The CHAIRMAN. In the judgment of the Chair, the gentleman is entitled to occupy five minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Has not the gentleman occupied that time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then I make the point of order that the gentleman shall not continue beyond that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HASKELL. Of course the Chair——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be glad to have the gentleman send to the Clerk's desk to be read the law upon which he bases his appeal from the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. COVERT. I may be permitted one word in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have five minutes, after the statute has been read.

Mr. COVERT. I desire to say now that the organic law itself contemplates that the working of this Department shall be of an experimental character; but it is made dependent upon annual appropriations passed from year to year by Congress as to the specific direction in which this experimental work shall be conducted.

In regard to the experiments in connection with the culture of tea, to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has referred, the investigation in that direction was the result of special legislation; legislation embodied in an annual appropriation bill.

Now, just one word with reference to the question under discussion, and I think I can make my point clear by referring to the phraseology of this bill, which will settle the controversy in question. My friend from Delaware [Mr. MARTIN] is earnest and eloquent in favor of his proposition to make a special appropriation for experiments in the culture of beets, with a view to the manufacture of sugar from them. And his proposition is supported just as earnestly by my friend from Kansas, [Mr. HASKELL.] I desire to call the attention of those gentlemen and of this committee to the phraseology of this paragraph of the bill:

For expenses of machinery and apparatus, labor, &c., to continue experiments in the manufacture of sugar from sorghum and other sugar-producing plants, $25,000, to be available immediately, &c.

It occurs to me that this phraseology relegates the whole matter to the Commissioner of Agriculture. If he sees fit to devote a part of this $25,000 to experimenting in the direction of producing sugar from beets, he is entirely at liberty to do so under the plain provisions of this paragraph.

Mr. SPRINGER. Allow me to call the attention of the Chair to a ruling made by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the river and harbor bill, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE.] A point of order was made against certain provisions in that bill upon the ground that the appropriations were not for the continuation of works heretofore authorized by law. The Chair in that case decided, I think, that the bill being one making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, the addition of another river or another harbor to the subjects of the bill was in continuation of works heretofore authorized by law, and therefore overruled the point of order. I say that on the analogy of that decision——

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] of course will not fail to remember that the chairman of the Committee of the Whole made his decision on the ground that the river and harbor appropriation bill was not a general appropriation bill. That was the point.

Mr. SPRINGER. I remember that the decision turned on that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Not only turned but rested on that.

Mr. SPARKS. Purely and solely on that account.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly; on that and nothing else.

Mr. SPRINGER. The Chair, before that point was raised, made some statement which led me to believe he held that these appropriations, being for the improvement of rivers and harbors, were in the line of the improvements previously authorized.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman will allow me to say that that would be a mere dictum of the Chair, and would not have any force here.

Mr. SPRINGER. Perhaps that was a dictum of the Chair; but I understood it to have been announced.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already decided that the amendment, while it authorizes an experiment, authorizes one of a million of experiments known to agricultural chemistry; and if the general law which has been read were construed as authorizing this amendment, there would be no limit to the kind of amendments that might be offered and their amount. From this ruling the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] takes an appeal. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken, there were ayes 62.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, (before the negative vote was announced.) I think a great many members are voting upon the merits of the amendment; they do not understand the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has stated it twice.

The negative vote having been taken,

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 62, the noes 68. The decision of the Chair is overruled.

Mr. COVERT. I call for tellers on this question; and I do so upon the assumption that there are many gentlemen who have voted under a misunderstanding, thinking they were voting upon the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HASKELL and Mr. COVERT were appointed.

Mr. CALKINS. Before the vote is taken again, I hope the Chair will restate the point of order and the decision from which the appeal is taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has sustained the point of order, ruling out the amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That $10,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the continuation of experiments in connection with the manufacture of sugar from beets and for the cultivation of beets for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. From the decision of the Chair that this amendment is not in order, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HASKELL] takes an appeal.

Mr. HASKELL. Now, will not the Chair have read that portion of the law——

The CHAIRMAN. Not while the Committee of the Whole is dividing. The gentleman will take his place as teller.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the Chair state the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 75.

So the decision of the Chair was not sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. MARTIN.]

Mr. BLAND. While believing the amendment to be clearly in order, I oppose it from the simple fact that the bill already contains a provision for making an appropriation for experiments with "sorghum and other sugar-producing plants;" so that there is no necessity for the amendment. I think there is no question about it being in order; but I doubt the propriety of making any further appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this paragraph was limited to one minute, which is now exhausted.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to, there being ayes 91, noes 47.

Mr. HATCH. I give notice that I shall ask a vote by yeas and nays in the House on this amendment.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the paragraph the following:

"And the Commissioner is hereby authorized and directed to continue experiments in the different localities throughout the United States by careful observation and investigation into the processes employed in the extraction and manufacture of sugar from sugar-growing plants and vegetables, and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, for that purpose."

Mr. COVERT. I am constrained, as a matter of consistency, to make a point of order against this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, in order to conform to the action of the Committee of the Whole, must overrule the point of order and entertain the amendment.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that the eminent chemist who has been conducting these experiments at the Department of Agriculture has recommended that they be continued throughout the country.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I would like to occupy just five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. There is not even one minute allowed for debate.

The amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reclamation of arid and waste lands:

For the reclamation of the arid and waste lands lying in certain Western States and Territories, $10,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be expended in experiments upon the lands of individuals or corporations, but only upon the lands belonging to the United States.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to amend by striking out of the paragraph just read "$10,000" and inserting "$30,000."

Mr. COVERT. I make a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope the gentleman will withhold his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] on the point of order.

Mr. BELFORD. I do not see how any point of order can lie against this amendment. It simply proposes to increase the amount of this appropriation. I do not know that we are bound by any cast-iron rule, so that when the committee reports a certain sum in a bill we are bound to accept that sum and cannot increase it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COVERT] will state his point of order.

Mr. COVERT. The point of order is that the proposed amendment changes existing law and is not in the direction of economy.

Mr. PAGE. But is this a general appropriation bill?

Mr. BELFORD. Before the Chair passes on the point of order I should like to be heard for a few moments. I hope the gentleman will reserve the point of order until I can be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. After the point of order has been decided the gentleman can be heard on the merits of the proposition. The gentleman from New York will please send to the Clerk's desk the existing law on the subject.

Mr. COVERT. The existing law is the appropriation bill for the present year. I have not got a copy of it at this moment.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the amount appropriated?

Mr. COVERT. Five thousand dollars.

Mr. CALKINS. This does not change that law; this goes into effect when that expires.

Mr. CONGER. No point of order was made against the paragraph, and I do not know, under the circumstances, any point of order ever was made against the right to increase or reduce the appropriation.

Mr. ROBINSON. I cannot see it is a change of existing law. It is simply to change the amount of appropriation made for a specific purpose. The purpose is recognized by law. That is the law. The amount of money to effectuate it is not the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not take the question from the committee, but will overrule the point of order.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, the other day this House appropriated over ten million dollars to improve rivers and harbors and creeks located in the Eastern States. West of the one hundredth meridian is a vast extent of territory that can only be utilized by sinking artesian wells and thereby procuring water for irrigating purposes. The State of Colorado and the Territories of Wyoming, Utah, and Dakota have paid into the Treasury of the United States more than one million and a half of revenue within the last few years, and the only appropriation that is afforded that section of the country is $10,000, and that is found in this bill.

What is the object of this appropriation? It is stated to be for the reclamation of arid and waste lands lying in certain Western States and Territories. It is for the reclamation of lands belonging to the Government of the United States. In the State of Colorado there are 66,880,000 acres of land, in the Territory of Utah 54,064,640, in the Territory of New Mexico 77,568,640, in the Territory of Dakota 96,596,480, and in the Territory of Wyoming 62,645,120 acres. Now, it is well known to every man who resides in the West that the great bulk of this land is arid, that it can only be cultivated through the agency of irrigation, and that the body of water already existing in the streams is not sufficient for the purpose. If that land is ever to be reclaimed, if it is ever to be made valuable for human habitation, then this Government, as the owner of that vast tract, must aid the people in its reclamation.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that one of the great problems before this people for solution consists in bringing the empty unemployed hands and the unoccupied lands of this country together. One of the great and growing evils demanding the attention of the American people is the condition of the overcrowded population of our great cities. The day will come when we will have to inaugurate a system of colonization looking to the removal of that overcrowded population and locating it on the vast tracts of land west of the one hundredth meridian; and I say that it is the duty this Government owes that population to fit those lands for future occupation and for future cultivation. I have voted cheerfully for appropriations necessary for other sections.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope I will not be cut off. I have been here four years and never yet got in under the hour rule. [Cries of "Go on!"] I hope I will be permitted to make my statement when I am pleading for the people of the country, in reference to whom the chairman [Mr. COX] spoke so eloquently the other day. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas will not make objection and restrict me to the few brief moments allowed in Committee of the Whole. I am here advocating the interest of this great and constantly growing western people. I appeal to this House, I appeal to the generosity of gentlemen to aid us of the West in securing the reclamation of this vast tract of arid land.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The Chair cannot change the rule.

Mr. KING. I hope the gentleman will be permitted to proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. KEIFER. I will take the floor and yield my time to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, when your people in the East and in the South ask us of the West to vote for the improvement of your rivers and harbors and streams of every kind we promptly do so. I think you ought to reciprocate, and manifest the same generous conduct toward us. Allow us to derive the same benefit from the national Treasury equally with yourselves. We get little enough under any circumstances. I look forward to the day when this arid waste, in the language of the Bible, will blossom like the rose. I appeal to your sense of justice, I appeal to your sense of generosity, and I appeal in behalf of the growing demand of this great section of the country, that you will give us water, that by this water we may baptize this land and regenerate it, and bring it into splendid cultivation. Give us water, that the land may be blessed with harvests; that upon its bosom may be located towns and cities; that it may be occupied by thousands and hundreds of thousands of happy homes; that it may, in fine, contribute to the future prosperity and wealth of this grand and magnificent Republic. The sum I ask for is small; but vote it, and we of the West will hold you in grateful remembrance. [Applause.]

I wish I had the power of speech possessed by my distinguished friend from New York, [Mr. COX.] If I possessed his eloquence and wit, I could interest this House and the country in this great project of restoring to fertility and beauty the American desert. Years ago, while traveling with him on the top of a coach, and through the Rocky Mountians, we talked of the subject of irrigating the plains; and when he returned to his home he sent me a book, from which I propose to read an extract or two. I refer to his famous work entitled Winter Sunbeams. I read from page 313, where the traveler, the scholar, the philosopher, politician, and the statesman uses this language:

> Having now seen under my own eyes the principal irrigation works of Spain, I feel more competent to write about it. In Valencia, from the rivers Turia and Jucar, there are 56,810 acres under irrigation; in Murcia, from the Segura, 25,915; at Orihuela, from the Segura, 50,318; at Elche, (place of plumy palms,) 40,010; Alicante, 9,139; at Granada, from the Douro and Genil, 46,930 acres. These works, whose results at least I have witnessed, comprise nearly one-half of the irrigation of Spain. The total quantity of irrigated land is 374,269 acres. The best works are those of Valencia, Murcia, and Granada. They are the oldest, being made by the Moors about the year 800. On the Spanish conquest and division of land the rules of the Saracens about water were re-established. Some of these works are made of masonry in which rain is collected, as at Alicante. The principal rivers of Spain, like the Tagus and Guadalquivir, run to the Atlantic with but little utility as motive or creative power. But almost anything, and in any quantity, of vegetable beauty and utility can be raised in Spain with this water power—peppers and peaches, apricots and apples, olives and oranges, sugar and citron, cotton and corn, potatoes and pears; and never less than two crops a year and sometimes four.

I will suspend the reading at this point to call your attention to the promises of the future when the Government adopts the policy pursued in Spain and secures water for the parched and thirsty plains of the West. We may not be blessed with olives and citrons, or with oranges or cotton, but we will have corn and oats and cattle; we will have fields laughing with golden harvests, homes filled with happy and industrious people; we will have rivulets of national wealth running from this now arid waste into the vaults of the Treasury. Redeem this land, and we will have States whose population will be as dense as that of New York or Pennsylvania. This Government can afford to do this, and the time will shortly come when public sentiment will compel Congress to take action on this important subject.

Thanking the House for the courteous attention it has accorded me, I leave the subject in its hands.

Mr. COVERT. Mr. Chairman, if the Committee on Agriculture had the power to exercise generosity, if they had the power to listen and respond to pathetic appeals, I think there would be but one sentiment, and that is, that there should be a sum granted in response to the petition so earnestly made by my friend from Colorado for water. It is not always an appeal for water that comes up from Colorado. It is not always a demand for that particular element. We cannot, however, consent to go into or pretend to make a trade with the West in this or any other respect. The members of the Committee on Agriculture, even though they come from the East, cannot, when the question of appropriations for the support of the various Departments of the Government are to be voted on, or even when it comes to an appropriation for the improvement of their rivers and harbors, merely by reason of that fact give their votes to improvements in the extreme West just as a matter of bargain or traffic.

Mr. Chairman, the last session of this Congress voted for this purpose, under an amendment offered by my friend from Colorado, the sum of $20,000. I do not think that amount or anything like it has been yet expended in these improvements. A portion of that money is lying in the Treasury, which has not been used, nor has it been found necessary to use it under the experiments so far conducted by the Commissioner. The Commissioner of Agriculture in his preliminary report to the President says that only one well has been sunk under this provision of last year's appropriation bill. The Commissioner is conservative and cautious in expressing his sentiments and very careful in giving his opinion in reference to the matter, and peculiarly careful in the wording of his report as to the results following this expenditure. He says that an examination and study of the geological formation in the locality where the well has been placed warrants the belief that water-bearing strata may be found. He does not say that it can be found, but is manifesty conservative, as I have stated, and particularly cautious in the language he uses.

Now, this Congress has already expended $20,000 for this purpose. This bill proposes to place at the disposition of the Commissioner $5,000 more to continue the experiment. I think that is a subject and has reference to an item where we should go slowly, cautiously, and carefully; and if it can be ascertained that this section of country has a water-bearing stratum, then the Congress of the United States, after that fact has been ascertained, can safely vote almost any amount of money that may be necessary to allow my friend from Colorado to have all of the water facilities he desires out in his country. He will then be able to come to Congress and ask that an appropriation shall be made for this special purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 109, noes 61.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. DIBRELL. I give notice that I shall ask for a vote by yeas and nays on that amendment in the House.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Insert after line 157:
> "For the purpose of investigating the location, direction, size, and veolcity of current of subterraneous water-courses, $500."

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to withhold the point of order?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I did not wish to prevent the gentleman from New York being heard upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It might then be too late.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I make the point of order now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MCMILLIN. My point of order is that it changes existing law and is not in the line of retrenchment.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the action of the committee the Chair would be disposed to overrule the point of order.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McMILLIN. Does the Chair overrule the point or order?

The CHAIRMAN. On account of the action of the committee on yesterday, which overruled the judgment of the Chair in reference to this matter, the Chair feels bound to hold that the point of order is not well taken. The Chair desires to state, however, that he does not give his own judgment in this connection, but simply conforms to the judgment of the Committee of the Whole as expressed on yesterday. The gentleman from New York will proceed.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. Mr. Chairman, if any gentleman feels himself inclined to oppose this amendment because it be mine I wish him to recollect that this is the first request I have made to the House for any appropriation. If there be any objection that the sum asked for be too small to be considered by the committee, I would make answer that it is offered as an entering-wedge, and that when we have commenced to investigate the subject, as proposed by this amendment, and have discovered its great importance to the country, I have no doubt that in future years a much larger sum can be appropriated in this direction.

Mr. Chairman, I want to state to this committee that there is water in the air; and sources of water—

The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear.

There will be found upon investigation to be openings of large streams from the deep seas which ascend into the mountain tops of the country, and which, if they be properly investigated, explained, and turned to account, will ultimately meet the question of watering the arid waste of our great western country. I think the Government has been too unmindful of the great importance of this subject in past years. There is a theory advanced, which has never yet been adopted, which may ultimately revolutionize the whole subject of water-courses, and while it may be turned to account to irrigate the great arid wastes of the West, it may be also effectually used by the river and harbor committee in filling up the streams which are at times under their attention to be watered. I can demonstrate to this committee that if you take a piece of dry earth and suspend it over and in contact with water it will very soon fill itself by some power which we erroneously designate as capillary attraction.

So, too, if I were able to cut off the Rocky Mountains at their base and had them properly desiccated to represent a piece of dry earth and were to suspend them on the Pacific Ocean, according to this theory the mountains would in the same way fill themselves with water; and in the center of the mountain there would be a stream rushing up to fill up the vacuum or dryness of the mountain as large as the Mississippi is at its mouth, which draws its supplies from the water-shed at the external surface of the Rocky Mountains.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

Forestry:
For the purpose of enabling the Commissioner of Agriculture to continue an investigation and report upon the subject of forestry, $5,000.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "$5,000" and insert "$6,000."

Mr. DUNNELL. Some five years ago Congress appropriated a small sum of money, I think $2,000, for the commencement of investigations touching the forest products of the country. Later the appropriation was continued and increased to $5,000. A gentleman from New York, exceedingly well informed on the subject of forestry, having visited all the schools of forestry not only in this country but in Europe, made his first annual report. That report attracted the attention of the entire country, and I may say it attracted the attention of all scientific men in Europe as well as in this country. That report has been called for, and is now found in all the libraries of Europe and in all the schools of forestry. A second report was prepared, and has been printed; and I am glad that the Committee on Agriculture has seen fit to continue this appropriation.

Now, let me say that this amount of $5,000 is inadequate, and its inadequacy shows itself in this, that the Commissioner of Agriculture is unable, with the $5,000, to do more than to give this commissioner $2,000 a year. This officer is contemplating a resignation of the important and interesting position which he holds because of the inadequacy of his compensation. I move to increase the amount $1,000. That will enable the Commissioner of Agriculture to give to this commissioner $3,000 as his compensation.

This gentleman is learned, and has at his command facilities for making much more money than he is now given by the Government for this important work; and, Mr. Chairman, the sum of $3,000 is less than the average amount given to gentlemen serving the Government in positions of like importance. This gentleman has traveled during the past year into upward of thirty States and Territories, and the entire expense of the trip was less than $300. A man of great economy and prudence in the use of the public money, securing from railroad companies and various agricultural associations passes over the railroads of the country, he is prepared at this time with an amount of information upon this exceedingly interesting subject that will be embodied in a third volume to be presented to Congress. It would be a calamity if he resigned his position.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAYES. I rise to give my indorsement to what the gentleman from Minnesota has said.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. HAYES. I will oppose the amendment pro forma.

Mr. HATCH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri rises to oppose the amendment.

Mr. HAYES. I simply want to say this in addition to what the gentleman from Minnesota has said: instead of making the amount $6,000 I would make it even more than that. I have known something of this gentleman from the State of New York who has been employed in this business. He has several times been before the committee on which I have served, and we have authorized the publication of his report. We have found him a very intelligent and thoroughly informed gentleman. His heart is in this work. And he is doing a work which is for the benefit not only of the West but of the whole country. He is a man whose abilities, as the gentleman from Minnesota has said, ought to entitle him to a salary of $3,000 a year; and I sincerely hope this committee will vote to increase the amount by $1,000, making the full amount of the appropriation $6,000, as the gentleman from Minnesota asks.

Mr. HATCH. I desire to say to the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri move an amendment?

Mr. HATCH. I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota. The appeal of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES] certainly did not come out of my time, for he was favoring the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri for five minutes if he moves a formal amendment.

Mr. HATCH. I move to strike out the last word.

I desire to say to the committee that $5,000 is all that is asked by the Commissioner of Agriculture for the next fiscal year for the continuation of this work. The proposition now to increase the appropriation to $6,000, if I understood the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota, is with a view to apply the additional amount to an increase of the salary of this commissioner. No reason has been given to the Committee on Agriculture why this gentleman's salary should be raised at this time. If it has ever been asked by the gentleman himself we have no information of it in the committee. The Commissioner of Agriculture in his report has not asked for it. In the Book of Estimates he only asks the committee to make an appropriation of $5,000, and when he was before the committee the Commissioner stated that $5,000 had been ample in the past and would be a sufficient sum to carry on this work for another year. I see no reason, therefore, why this officer's salary should be raised $1,000 when the other salaries provided in this bill have been kept as fixed by law or in the appropriation act of last year. I hope the committee will not adopt the amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. DUNNELL; and upon a division there were—ayes 49, noes 86.

No further count being called for, the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Building for the display of the agricultural implements:
For the purpose of erecting a building on the agricultural grounds for the display of all agricultural implements that may be presented to the Department for exhibition therein, $10,000.

Mr. COVERT. On behalf of the Committee on Agriculture I move to insert after the paragraph just read that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

For labor, new implements, repair of tools, wagons, and carts, manure and purchasing trees for arboretum, $5,000; repairing and resurfacing the concrete roads and walks on the grounds, $3,000.

Mr. COVERT. In explanation of that amendment I desire to say that it was not included in the regular estimates of the Commissioner sent to the Committee on Agriculture, but was included in the Book of Estimates sent in by the Secretary of the Treasury. The Committee on Agriculture supposed that these items would be inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill. Finding that they have not been placed in that bill, and at the request of the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Agriculture have instructed me to move them to the pending bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. COVERT. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7099) making appropriations for the Agricultural Department of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and recommended that it be passed.

Mr. COVERT. I move the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. COVERT moved to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote asked upon any amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask a separate vote on the amendment moved by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] increasing the appropriation in regard to waste and arid lands.

Mr. HATCH. I ask a separate vote upon the amendments offered by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MARTIN] appropriating $10,000 for experiments in the culture of beets and the manufacture of sugar therefrom.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the other amendments will be voted on in gross.

The amendments upon which no separate vote was asked were then agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first amendment upon which a separate vote is asked will now be read.

The amendment was to insert after line 145 of the printed bill the following:

That $10,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated for the continuation of experiments in connection with the manufacture of sugar from beets, and for the cultivation of beets for that purpose.

The question was taken upon the amendment by a viva voce vote, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HATCH. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

Many MEMBERS. Oh no!

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes 31, noes 83.

So (one-fifth voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 99, not voting 79; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. COBB said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote on either roll-call?

Mr. COBB. No, sir; I did not answer on either call; and I want to state the reason, if the Chair will allow me. I was absent in the committee-room, at work upon business of the House; I was not informed that this vote was being taken. For that reason I ask leave to vote. It occurs to me that to do so under the circumstances would be no infraction of the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the point.

Mr. COBB. I think that if a member is absent on business of the House, and with leave of the House, the rule ought not to apply.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wanted to raise the same inquiry in regard to my own case, as I was detained from the House under the same circumstances.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the rule carefully.

Mr. COBB. I was actually engaged in the discharge of duties imposed upon me by the House, and had no information that the roll was being called on this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the rule carefully before making his decision.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It will not be forgotten that the Committee on Appropriations has leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] placed his case on still stronger ground—the fact that he was engaged on a conference committee.

Mr. COBB. No, sir; I did not say I was engaged on a conference committee. I stated I was engaged on business of the House by leave of the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] and myself, as members of a sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations, were at work in the committee-room by leave of the House, and were not apprised that this vote was being taken.

The SPEAKER. After examining the point the Chair will announce his decision.

Mr. DWIGHT. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. MASON, is now and has been for the last five days detained at his room on account of illness.

Mr. AIKEN. My colleague, Mr. O'CONNOR, is absent from the House by reason of sickness.

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. ORTH with Mr. MYERS, on all questions except for the purpose of making a quorum, until further notice, on account of the illness of Mr. MYERS.

Mr. KENNA with Mr. WARD, for this day.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS with Mr. CHALMERS.

Mr. SPEER with Mr. MULDROW, on this bill.

Mr. HOUSE with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. CLAFLIN with Mr. BLAND.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama, with Mr. WASHBURN.

Mr. CLARDY with Mr. RUSSELL of Massachusetts.

Mr. NICHOLLS with Mr. JOYCE.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. BLACKBURN with Mr. WADDILL; the former would vote "ay," the latter "no."

Mr. KELLEY with Mr. MCKENZIE.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, with Mr. HAZELTON.

Mr. HOOKER with Mr. CALKINS, on political questions.

Mr. CALKINS. As I did not consider this a political question, I have voted.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The next amendment on which a separate vote was asked was read, as follows:

In line 154 strike out "$10,000" and insert "$30,000," so as to read:
"For the reclamation of the arid and waste lands lying in certain Western States and Territories, $30,000."

The amendment was not agreed to, there being—ayes 42, noes 70.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. On the passage of this bill the yeas and nays will be taken as required by the rules.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 208, nays 0, not voting 83; as follows:

Mr. COVERT moved that by unanimous consent the reading of the names be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. SPEER with Mr. MULDROW, on this bill.

Mr. KNOTT with Mr. CABELL.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COVERT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. UPSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 6719) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 378) providing for the printing and distribution of the report of the Commissoner of Education for the year 1880.

STOCKBRIDGE AND MUNSIE INDIANS.

Mr. WARNER. I ask by unanimous consent to present a communication from the Secretary of the Interior relating to the relief of the Stockbridge and Munsie Indians, and to move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed. There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ADDITIONAL ENROLLING CLERKS.

Mr. ATKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report the following resolution, which I ask by unanimous consent may be considered at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to employ not exceeding two clerks to assist the enrolling clerk during the remainder of this session, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, at a rate of compensation to be fixed by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. ATKINS. They may be necessary or they may not be necessary; but, if they are employed, provision ought to be made for their payment.

The resolution was adopted.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

Mr. COX. I desire to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that to-morrow at the first opportunity I shall call up the apportionment bill as the unfinished business. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will not object, I trust, as we have given way so often in reference to this most important matter. We have deferred to friends on both sides, and now I give notice that to-morrow I shall call it up for action.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman propose to antagonize the appropriation bill?

Mr. COX. I suppose the Committee on Appropriations will not antagonize the apportionment bill.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the Committee on Appropriations propose, after commencing the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, to give way for action on the apportionment bill? [Cries of "Regular order!"]

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the order of the House the committee takes up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 7203) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, and for other purposes. The first reading of the bill will be for information.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move, Mr. Chairman, by unanimous consent the first reading of the bill for information be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will now be read for amendment.

Mr. WARNER. Have points of order been reserved on this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. They have.

The Clerk read as follows:

Post-office and court-house, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania: For continuation of building, $350,000.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move at the end of the paragraph to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of the amount hereby appropriated, shall be expended in completing immediately and fitting up for use the rooms in said building intended for occupancy by the United States courts and the officers connected therewith.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve the point of order on that amendment until after the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made his statement.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, the judges of the United States courts in the city of Philadelphia are very illy accommodated with room. There is now absolutely no proper room for the accommodation of jurors and witnesses and parties to suits before those courts. Beside this inconvenience the officers of the courts themselves are so far separated from the court itself that there is not that facility necessary for the satisfactory discharge of the public business. The judges themselves, as well as the witnesses and those having business before the courts, find it is almost impossible to use the rooms now occupied with any satisfaction to any one. All that is desired in the amendment I have offered is out of this appropriation of $350,000 it shall be provided that the sum of $25,000 may be expended immediately in preparing rooms in this public building, in the city of Philadelphia, for the immediate occupancy of the United States courts and their officers.

Mr. BLOUNT. I see no objection to the gentleman's amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to offer an additional amendment to come in at the end of the proviso just adopted by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

And be it further provided, That there shall be expended at once, out of the amount herein appropriated, a sum sufficient for the immediate completion and fitting up of as many of the rooms in said building as will accommodate the post-office of said city.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve all questions of order on the amendment until the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made his statement.

Mr. O'NEILL. The completion of this building, Mr. Chairman, is going on very slowly. It was commenced seven or eight years ago, and for some years appropriations were made amounting to $700,000 a year. The building then, of course, made headway, but it is now standing in an unfinished condition, and so long as it is unfinished the present accommodations of the post-office of the city of Philadelphia will remain poor and inadequate to the business which is done there. I simply desire, in the amendment which I have submitted and which is in character similar to the one already adopted by the committee, that there shall be sufficient rooms in this building, put in order immediately, to accommodate the business of the post-office of the city of Philadelphia.

There is no adequate room there now for the employés, messengers, for the clerks, or for any one connected with the post-office. The business has to be done in a very crowded manner, although correctly, under our present postmaster as it has been done under his predecessors. There is and has been no complaint against any of them. But there is complaint of want of room to do the work, and at the same time the people are not accommodated. As it is, the office is crowded into rooms entirely insufficient in which to transact the business.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as this will not increase the aggregate amount of the appropriation made, the proposition is simply that there shall be expended a sufficient sum out of the amount appropriated to put the rooms in order in the new post-office building for the accommodation of the post-office without further delay.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think, Mr. Chairman, that provision is liable to the question of order. In addition to the fact that it is attempting to apply an appropriation made for another year, it is also directing how this money shall be appropriated or used and for a given purpose. It is an attempt made to direct the architect who is in charge of the construction of that building to do a certain work in a certain way. It is therefore legislation upon a bill, and not in order upon that ground.

Mr. O'NEILL. Let me answer the gentleman from Georgia. I do not suppose that the expense of doing this work, which is to be done out of the aggregate amount appropriated, will exceed $100,000, and is exactly in the line of the purpose of the appropriation. It is simply indicating that a portion of the work shall be expedited. I cannot see what difference it makes to this committee or the Committee on Appropriations how the work is done or what portion of the building shall be done first, so there are proper accommodations for the post-office and the people. That is all that is expected to be done at all events, and the sooner it is done the better.

I can give an instance, Mr. Chairman, within my own knowledge of how this is done in our great municipal building, or City Hall, in Philadelphia. It is architecturally the greatest building and perhaps the finest specimen of modern architecture that the world has ever seen. That building is to be erected for the local wants of the great city of Philadelphia, and has from time to time, under direction of the proper authorities, had certain rooms or portions of it finished while the building is still in course of erection, in order to provide accommodations for the supreme court of Pennsylvania and offices of the city government. This way of going on with our municipal building has given satisfaction, and also afforded accommodations which are necessary for the public, which had heretofore been very limited. Now, the building which is being erected by the Government for a post-office and United States courts in Philadelphia might be managed, and satisfactorily so, upon the same principle. I cannot see why it would be improper to hurry up a portion of the building for the accommodation of the people there who have post-office business.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman will be confined to the strict point of order, as I do not think we ought to waste time in arguing a question if it is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Georgia on the subject as to where it changes existing law. As the Chair understands, the law provides for erecting a building there for that purpose. This amendment, as the Chair understands, is simply to complete a certain portion of it, and does not seem to be in conflict with the general law.

Mr. BLOUNT. The Chair will observe that I have not made a question of order that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. What, then, is the point of order?

Mr. BLOUNT. The rule provides that—

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Now, I make the point of order that this bill is an appropriation of money for the next fiscal year, and that any proposition diverting the fund so appropriated into the current fiscal year is not germane at all to this bill. The appropriations for this fiscal year were made during the last session, and consequently this proposition is not germane here.

Again, sir, under the law as it now exists the construction of this building is a matter of discretion with the architect; that is to say, as to the progress he shall make and in what method he shall proceed. Here is a direction or a provision restraining that discretion on his part and directing him to do a particular thing, to wit: to proceed to complete certain portions of the building, and at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion——

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman I would like to say a word——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has already argued his side of the question of order, and the Chair is ready to decide the question.

The Chair would have no doubt that the amendment would be in order, provided it applied to the next fiscal year; but as this provision looks to the application of a certain portion of the fund appropriated for the next fiscal year to the present fiscal year, it undoubtedly changes the law to that extent, and is therefore out of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, so great is the urgency for the post-office accommodation that I will modify my amendment so as to provide that the sum for fitting up these rooms shall be expended out of the appropriation for the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will forward his amendment to the desk, the Chair will have it read.

Mr. O'NEILL. Let the amendment which I have sent up be amended so as to read: to be expended out of the funds appropriated for the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment as proposed to be modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of the provision the following:

"And be it further provided, That there be expended during the next fiscal year out of the amount herein appropriated a sum sufficient for the immediate completion and fitting up of as many of the rooms of said building as will accommodate the post-office of said city."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that the words "during the next fiscal year" should be omitted from the amendment, as that would make it applicable to the year 1883.

Mr. O'NEILL. Very well; let those words be stricken out. A few years ago, Mr. Chairman, appropriations for public buildings were made continuous in their expenditure and not made from year to year. That is to say, the money was expended right along. It has only been within the last few years that the laws respecting the erection of public buildings in the United States have been changed in that respect. The change has been all wrong.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order.

Mr. O'NEILL. In what respect? I should like to be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to five minutes in which to support his amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand he is arguing the question as to the change of law.

Mr. O'NEILL. Not at all. I am simply stating what is the effect of the present method of appropriation as to public buildings and the disadvantages to the people for whose benefit these buildings are erected.

But, sir, so great is the desire to have the post-office at Philadelphia accommodated in the way in which it should be accommodated that I have felt it my duty to appeal to the committee to let us have enough money to go on with the completion of the post-office rooms after the 1st of July. The object of my amendment is to have the work on them proceeded with in this way, and finished as soon as possible after that date.

Mr. BLOUNT. I should like to have the amendment read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. O'NEILL. I have struck out the word "immediate."

Mr. BLOUNT. Is the gentleman quite sure that the amount appropriated here will be sufficient for the purpose?

Mr. O'NEILL. Certainly, sir; it will be amply sufficient. I do not believe it will take $100,000 to complete these rooms. Anyhow, not much more.

Mr. BLOUNT. I shall not object to the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Court-house and post-office, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania: For continuation of building, $100,000.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. I do not see in the bill any appropriation for the building for appraisers' stores at San Francisco. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the estimate was omitted for the Treasury Department or whether it has escaped the attention of the Committee on Appropriations?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California propose any amendment?

Mr. PAGE. I will in a moment, if necessary; but I am at present asking a question for information.

Mr. BLOUNT. There was no estimate sent to the committee for that purpose; and last session we appropriated a sum for the purpose of completing that building. That is the information of the committee.

Mr. PAGE. When I left there the work was quite incomplete. The approaches and sidewalks had not been made.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from California will understand that the appropriation for this fiscal year is being expended now. The very work he wants done is to be done during this year, and the amount could not have been expended while he was there.

Mr. PAGE. We have sent to the Department to find out whether there has been an omission in regard to this in sending in the estimates. Perhaps it may not be necessary to offer an amendment; but will the gentleman from Georgia allow an amendment to come in after this part of the bill has been passed over, if we find that this has been omitted by mistake?

Mr. BLOUNT. The last sundry civil act, being for the present fiscal year, contained the following:

Appraisers' stores, San Francisco, California: For completion of building and fencing, grading, and for paving approaches, $35,000.

The expenditure of this amount, $35,000, commenced with this fiscal year, beginning on the first day of July last.

Mr. PAGE. Do you think there is money enough appropriated to complete the work?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I was temporarily absent, and during my absence the appropriation for the public building at Cincinnati was reached. I ask consent to go back to that item that I may offer an amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I must object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, it is not in the power of the Chair to go back.

The Clerk read the following:

Custom-house and post-office, Saint Louis, Missouri: For continuation of building, $350,000.

Mr. KIMMEL. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 56 insert:

"For a post-office and other offices in Baltimore, Maryland, on the site purchased by the United States for that object, the sum of $300,000, to be expended by the Secretary of the Treasury according to the plans and estimates made by the Secretary of the Treasury and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Interior; provided that the cost of said building shall not exceed the amount of said estimates."

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the question of order that there is no law authorizing the construction of that building.

Mr. KIMMEL. Upon the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia I have to say that the legislation for this post-office in Baltimore City has been continued for about five years; that during those five years two reports have been made, five bills have been passed, three appropriations have been made. I submit, sir, that constitutes a continuing appropriation.

Now, sir, throughout the whole length of this legislation the purpose is clearly expressed; the purchase of a site for a post-office in Baltimore City. One of these acts appropriates $4,000 for expenses of condemnation. One appropriates $550,000 for the purchase of a lot. Another appropriates $4,000 for the expense of preparing plans and estimates. The Government has the titles made to it. The titles are in the Government. The Government has exercised the right of ownership over the property. It has rented this property. It has served notice on the tenants to quit this property. It has directed or permitted the tearing down of buildings on that property. It has directed or permitted the erection of fences on that property. It has done every act that goes to show that this is a continuing appropriation for a public work now in progress.

Further, sir, they have ordered every tenant to move off this property. The rent of the property is only $5,000 a year while it has cost the Government $550,000, on which the interest is $22,000. It is said that this amendment is not in order because this is not a work in progress. I have shown it is a work in progress.

But, sir, there is another construction upon the rule. The rule says:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

What has been the object of all this legislation? Certainly none other than the erection of a post-office building in Baltimore City. What use would the Government have for a site unless for some such object? And the object is the erection of a post-office building. It is not necessary for me to trouble the House with quotations from past legislation. I say to the House that the object is expressed in such legislation from its first initiation in 1875 down to the last appropriation in 1880. The object is fully and clearly set forth.

Another point. The Secretary of the Treasury was directed by Congress to obtain a site in the city of Baltimore, either by condemnation or by purchase. He chose to obtain it by purchase. For reasons satisfactory to himself he changed the site he had originally selected. The law originally limited the cost of the site for the post-office building in Baltimore to $500,000. It was found that the new site would cost $600,000. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds refused to report a bill for more than $550,000, and made that appropriation upon the condition that the remainder of the amount necessary to purchase such site should be contributed by the city of Baltimore. That was the condition on which that appropriation was made.

Now, that was a contract entered into between the United States Government and the city of Baltimore, and the city of Baltimore has fulfilled its portion of the contract by contributing the sum of $50,000 toward the amount necessary to purchase the site selected. That contract is as binding upon the honor of Congress as would be a contract by an individual, where a decree in equity for its enforcement might be obtained.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLOUNT. It seems to me that this is a very simple proposition. The question is whether or not any law has been passed authorizing the construction of a public building in the city of Baltimore. I have before me a bill reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, authorizing the obtaining of a suitable site, by purchase or otherwise, for a public building, which site shall leave the building unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than fifty feet. The bill goes on then to provide for the construction of a suitable building upon such lot, "to be based upon calculations and specifications that will warrant the completion of the building at a cost not to exceed the sum of $75,000."

I quote from that bill simply to illustrate what the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds deemed to be necessary legislation to authorize the construction of a public building. The bill not only provides for the purchase of a site, but it also gives specific authority for the construction thereon of a building according to plans and specifications which shall not exceed in cost a certain sum.

Now I concede that the limitation as to the cost of the building might be left out of the bill. But the language in reference to the authority to construct a building is an absolute necessity. Such authority did not exist anywhere before that legislation.

Now, how does my friend from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] propose to avoid that point? He says that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds recommended and Congress passed a law for the purchase of a site for a public building to be erected in the city of Baltimore. Long before the war the Government purchased a site for a public building at Pittsburgh, but it was never regarded by this House as in order to add to an appropriation bill any given sum on the idea that the construction of such a building had been authorized. On the contrary, during the very last session of Congress the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported a bill authorizing the construction of a building at Pittsburgh, the site for which had been in the possession of the Government since a period antedating the war. I submit that the purchasing of a site is not authorizing the construction of a building. The Government may purchase the site and postpone the construction of the building.

Again, the gentleman argues that because estimates have been made of the cost of this building that therefore authorizes the construction of the building. On the contrary, it seems to me that it argues the other way; that Congress, before it would determine upon the construction of the building, before it would authorize the construction of any particular building, desired to have the plans and estimates in order that it might review them if necessary.

It seems to me, therefore, that this is a very simple proposition; that there has been no law passed authorizing the construction of this building. The gentleman does not cite any such law, but he argues inferentially from the purchase of a site and the providing for plans and estimates. That is all there is in it.

I desire to say that so far as this building in Baltimore is concerned, I have not the slightest objection to its construction. But the Committee on Appropriations has been assailed time and again in this House by the committee of which the gentleman himself is a member, for coming in here with appropriations for the construction of public buildings when there was no law authorizing such construction.

The rules of this House were intended to take from the Committee on Appropriations any authority to report legislation. When any public building is authorized by law to be constructed, the Committee on Appropriations has then the right to report a provision making the necessary appropriations; but they have no authority to report a law authorizing such construction.

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Chairman, it has not been my habit to discuss questions of order on this floor, because my judgment is that as a general rule it is better to leave such questions at once to the decision of the presiding officer. But at the request of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] I have looked into this question, and my opinion is that the previous legislation on this subject has brought this proposed amendment clearly within the spirit if not within the strict letter of the rule.

It appears that Congress has by law appropriated $550,000 out of the public Treasury to purchase in the city of Baltimore a site for an express purpose—the erection of a post-office and other public buildings for the use of the Government. That money has been expended by the Secretary of the Treasury. An appropriation of four or five thousand dollars was likewise made to defray the expenses of preparing plans and specifications for the building to be erected upon this particular site.

Now, suppose that the Government of the United States had owned this ground in the first place, and instead of making an appropriation of the public money to purchase the site had made an appropriation to purchase materials—stone, brick, and hardware—for the erection of a public building upon that ground, would any gentleman on this floor say that this was not a commencement of the work under the law? And will any gentleman say that the purchase of a site for the erection of a public building is not just as necessary to the construction of that work as the purchase of the materials out of which the building is to be constructed? I imagine that no gentleman will take such a position.

Then, sir, we have a case in which a public work has been to all intents and purposes commenced under the authority of law. The ground upon which it stands, the foundation which shall support it, has been purchased for that express purpose.

We have had other cases like this. There was an appropriation made some years ago for the purchase of a site at Topeka, Kansas, upon which to erect a public building; and after that, without any additional legislation, a clause was inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill appropriating the necessary funds to commence the construction of that building. The same thing occurred with regard to the Government building at Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania. In the first place a law was passed to provide for the purchase of a site; and that was followed by a provision in the sundry civil appropriation bill to purchase the materials and pay for the labor to commence the construction of the building.

Mr. BRAGG. Was there a point of order made against that?

Mr. CARLISLE. I was going to say that I do not know whether a point of order was made in those cases or not. I allude to them not as an authority upon the question of order, but to show that this proposed amendment is not without precedent, at least in this House.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I wish to make a statement in regard to the building at Topeka. I made a motion in this House to insert an appropriation for the erection of that building. A point of order was made against it; and I urged against that point of order the very reasons which are urged now so forcibly as I think by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE.] Yet the point of order was sustained.

Mr. CARLISLE. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think the reasons were sound, because otherwise there would be required, first, a law providing for the purchase of a site for the particular purpose, and then that utterly useless piece of legislation, a provision for the erection of a building on that site. If there were no precedents, I submit to the Chair and to the committee that the legislation which has been had in this case is sufficient to bring the amendment clearly within the reason of the rule. The House and the country has understood ever since the passage of the act that it was the intention of the Government of the United States to erect a public building upon this ground; and unless the Government shall proceed and erect it the sum of $550,000 has been appropriated out of the public Treasury for no useful purpose whatever.

If it be conceded, I repeat in conclusion, that the provision of a site upon which to erect a building is as necessary as the purchase of material and the payment for labor in making the erection, then it follows conclusively that the purchase of a site under a law which provides the purpose for which it shall be used is to all intents and purposes a commencement of that work.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, I think the facts bearing upon this question are before the committee, as well as before the chairman; but I ask the attention of the Chair for a moment to a careful reading of the rule under which this point of order is made:

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law—

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the rule stopped there, then the point of order of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] would be well taken; to that clause alone does the point of order go. But, Mr. Chairman, the rule does not stop there. It goes on to say—> unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit to your parliamentary experience and your common sense that, taking the admitted facts in this case—the purchase of this site by the United States Government, the expenditure of a large sum of money, the estimates which have been made by the officers of the Government—it is an object in progress, and that, being such under the rule, it is in the line of economy, it is in the line of prudence, that we should go on and complete an object or a work already in progress. I submit, therefore, that the amendment of my friend from Maryland is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] what is in progress, what is going on, what is being done?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Why, sir, what object did the Government have in expending $550,000?

Mr. SPARKS. That does not prove that a work is in progress.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I say this is a public building which was conceived in this House by an appropriation; it has been and is now, if you please, in process of parturition by the act and agency of the Government; it is, when fully developed, a public building of the United States.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. TALBOTT. I wish to answer the question the gentleman from Illinois put to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to answer the question which the gentleman from Illinois put to the gentleman from Tennessee. He wants to know what work is in progress. The city of Baltimore acquired that square with every brick and every house standing. Since the acquisition of title all the buildings, with the exception of the United States court-house and the two hotels, Rennert's and Guy's, have been torn down.

The CHAIRMAN. Where is the law authorizing the tearing down of these buildings?

Mr. TALBOTT. The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized under that act, and $4,000 was appropriated for plans and specifications for the erection of this public building. That has been done, and it is sufficient basis for us to say to the House that progress has been made.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question. Under the construction which you give that rule, every man who buys a building lot is in the construction of a dwelling-house or store. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If I bought it for that purpose, of course.

Mr. TALBOTT. That is sufficient foundation for it.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. It is, if I intended it for a store-house.

Mr. BRAGG. If you intended it for a store-house, does that necessarily say you are engaged in the construction of a building?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. That is the object I had in view when I bought it.

Mr. FRYE. I think the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin is full of sophism. The Government of the United States has no right whatever to buy a lot except for a special purpose, a public building, a navy-yard, or something of that kind. When the law authorized the purchase of a lot, it only authorized it because the Government had a special object which is declared in the very law itself, and that is for the erection of a post-office. And further, I was going to make the same point the gentleman from Tennessee made.

Mr. BRAGG. I will ask the gentleman from Maine a question, if he will yield for that purpose.

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. BRAGG. If the bill reads so much to buy a site for the erection of a post-office, does not proper statutory construction say that the erection of a post-office is a different thing from the purchase of a site and not part and parcel of the same thing, for one thing is bought for the purpose of erecting the other thing upon it.

Mr. FRYE. No, Mr. Chairman, I do not understand it so at all. The Government would have no right to purchase that lot of land unless it added to it the purpose and object of the purchase. And the object and purpose here were added to it in the law which authorized it, and that was upon which to erect a public edifice for a post-office.

And then the law went on further and made an appropriation for the plan. The plan is a part of the building. The plan is a part of the object. It paid its money for the plan; it paid its money for the object, and in my judgment the point is perfectly clear.

But let me go a step further. The Government has torn down buildings on it, has done work on it, has notified the tenants to move off of it. It is a public work to-day in progress, and the United States is to-day progressing with it, and therefore this appropriation can properly be made, as the question of authorization does not enter into it in the least degree.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to state another thing in addition to what I have already said. The Secretary of the Treasury, through the custom-house officer of the city of Baltimore, has served notice on the only two tenants on that property, the proprietors of the two hotels, Rennert's and Guy's, to vacate for the purpose of continuing this public work, and these proprietors have accepted the notice, and are going to move out in sixty days.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I heartily concur in the view taken of this question by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE.] I think when by law the United States purchased a piece of ground for a specific purpose it cannot be diverted from that purpose except by subsequent legislation. And I want to advert for a moment to the case of the Topeka building. I think the judgment of the Chair there was erroneous, and I desire the chairman to fully understand the ruling in that case. The facts were these: By an act of Congress $10,000 had been appropriated to purchase a site upon condition, I think, that the city of Topeka should appropriate an equal sum of money—at least the fact is the city of Topeka did appropriate $10,000 for that purpose, and the United States $10,000 for that purpose—and the grounds were purchased and cession of jurisdiction made by the State of Kansas to the Federal Government. When the sundry civil appropriation bill was pending I made a motion to insert an appropriation of $40,000 or $50,000, I think, and some gentleman of the Committee on Appropriations made the point of order against it. I urged against the point of order the very reasons so forcibly advanced by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. When was that and who was in the chair?

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. My recollection is that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] was in the chair. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman from Kentucky himself.

The CHAIRMAN. What session of Congress was it?

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I think it was in the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Chairman, there is one point briefly alluded to in the remarks of the gentleman from Maine that governs this whole case absolutely, if you are to obey a technical construction of the law. The Congress of the United States has appropriated a sum of money by special act to procure plans for this building. These plans were bought. An architect was employed to draw them. They were drawn, accepted, purchased, and paid for by the Government. That is, the plans for this building.

Now, no one would dispute if this Government had bought material, bricks, stone, or iron but that they had actually commenced the construction of the building. And if the legal attention of the Chair had been drawn to suits at law where the construction of buildings is called in question, he would have been familiar with the rulings of courts, that the plan is a part and parcel of the construction. When that plan was adopted by an act of Congress passed, the plan accepted by the authorities and paid for, the building at Baltimore was commenced, and there is no escape from it.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Chairman, this rule has been read, which provides that—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Now, sir, there never has been one dollar of money appropriated to erect a building for the purpose contemplated by this appropriation in Baltimore, and no gentleman can insist that there ever has been. A site has been selected, and a few dollars have been expended in examining proper locations and getting up a plan for the building, but that is all. Now, the plan of the building is simply a convenient and necessary method of arriving at a satisfactory solution of the question of details of the building itself. A plan is drawn with a view to determine the kind of building and its arrangement. But it is no permanent part of the construction, because a hundred plans may be drawn up before one is selected, and even then they may all be torn up.

There never has been one dollar appropriated by the Government of the United States to erect a building on this site. There has been a site selected for the building, that is all. Now, Mr. Chairman, we had just as well tear up all our rules if we do not intend to abide by them.

I know nothing of the propriety of this building, but if it is to be built at all, let us proceed right. Let us proceed under our rules. They have the site; the Government has already paid for that, but nothing else. When money is appropriated for the building, or after the work is actually commenced, then it will be in order under our rules, certainly, to appropriate for the continuance of the work in progress, and no objection can be taken. But to say that a building is in progress simply because a plan may have been suggested seems to be an absurdity. I ask the gentleman, therefore, under our rules how it is possible that this appropriation can be made when objection is raised against it? I hope, sir, our rules will be rigidly adhered to.

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that we must follow our rules; but before we can do that we must understand our rules. Our twenty-first rule provides that there shall be no appropriation in a general appropriation bill unless it be for a continuance of appropriations for public works already ordered, &c. Now, I am not going to raise the question of the purchase of the site, although that purchase was necessarily the first step. But the gentleman from Illinois and the committee will observe that following the purchase of the site came the appropriation for the building itself. The appropriation for the site was under a law by itself, a specific law.

Mr. SPARKS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. McLANE. I have only five minutes, and I prefer to continue without interruption.

Mr. SPARKS. We have already the site. Now, if the Government chooses any time to begin the building—because the Government can take its time to do it—that is another question. But the point here is, that there never has been a dollar appropriated for the erection of that building.

Mr. McLANE. Allow me now to answer the gentleman's own point. The gentleman from Illinois omits to observe that the site was purchased under the authority of one law. It was purchased under a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase in the city of Baltimore a lot of ground for the erection of this building, on condition that the city of Baltimore should also contribute the sum of $50,000 toward the expense. Now, we have passed already upon a law which purchased the site. Then we come to the general appropriation law of 1880, and I ask the attention of the committee and also the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to one item in that appropriation bill. On page 34 of the volume of laws will be found this item, this being the law:

Post-office, Baltimore, Maryland: The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to cause plans to be prepared for the said building, and to report to Congress at its next session the estimated cost of building the same.

Now, here is the authority of law covering the building of a post-office in the city of Baltimore. The purchase of the original site first and then, following in the sundry civil appropriation bill, the authority that the Secretary of the Treasury shall present plans for completing the building, and the sum of $4,000 is appropriated to cover the necessary expenses.

Now we come to the appropriation bill of the following year, the next sundry civil bill, and in that we find an appropriation of $300,000 made for continuing the object, that is, the construction of that building.

I believe there is intelligence enough and liberality enough in this House to take the view of the third clause of our twenty-first rule which I have suggested. It is simply for the purpose of giving notice that the item in the bill must be for an object already decided upon by law; and the law has already decided that there shall be a post-office in the city of Baltimore; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed by the law to send an estimate for the whole amount for that building, which he has done; and you have before you now the estimate made in pursuance of law for a building, and you now proceed to continue the appropriations for that object.

Mr. SPARKS. For the continuation of the plans or for the proposed building?

Mr. McLANE. For the completion of the building. If the gentleman had read the law he would not have talked about the plans.

I wish further to call the attention of the committee to those two laws in this connection. The first authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a site for a post-office in Baltimore, subject to the approval of Congress; and then comes the law of 1880 approving the site and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to estimate for the completion of the building. And he has done so. He has sent his estimates for the completion of the building precisely as the law required him to do.

How frivolous it is to stand here and say we have had no law authorizing the construction of this building, when by one law the Secretary of the Treasury has bought the site, subject to our approval, and then in another law we have approved the site and required the Secretary to give us an estimate for completing the building.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman from Maryland wants to be fair, does he not? The second law mentioned is an amendment of the first as to the purchase of a site.

Mr. McLANE. No; not at all. It is an item of the appropriation bill.

Mr. SPARKS. The first appropriated $500,000 for the site, and the second amended that by adding $50,000. That is my recollection.

Mr. McLANE. It is not a question about being fair, it is a question about being intelligent.

Mr. SPARKS. Precisely; the gentleman does not suppose I insinuated he wanted to deceive anybody. But I thought it was well the thing should be fairly stated to the House.

Mr. McLANE. It shall be fairly stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. SPARKS. And I wanted to direct the attention of the gentleman from Maryland, if he will hear me, and it is due to me he should, to what is my recollection of that law. The first law appropriated $500,000 for this site. Subsequently they came to Congress wanting to increase that $50,000. I may be mistaken, but I think I am right.

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SPARKS. And I want to insist it was really one law and not two.

Mr. ATKINS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maryland a question, his answer to which may throw some light upon this subject. What is the language of the law authorizing the purchase of a site for a public building?

Mr. McLANE. In reply to the honorable gentleman from Illinois, I wish to say to him there was no question of an amendment of the law.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I call all these gentlemen to order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired, and the Chair so notified him some time ago.

Mr. McLANE. With the indulgence of the House——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is not in order; the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] has been recognized.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose, and Mr. ROBINSON took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 7036) to establish post-routes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 4572) defining the verification of returns of national banks; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 315) amending and re-enacting the joint resolution approved June 14, 1879, directing a monument to mark the birthplace of George Washington.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 1945) to repeal taxes on deposits with banks, banking associations, and bankers; and Joint resolution (S. No. 165) for the printing and distributing special reports relating to the tenth census.

The message further announced that the Senate agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 1292) to provide for the removal of the terms of the circuit and district courts now held at Exeter, for and within the district of New Hampshire, to the city of Concord.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] in making the point of order on the amendment, that it was against the third clause of Rule XXI, read the rule to a certain point and there stopped. He read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law.

There he stopped. Now, I claim that the whole of the sentence should be completed before the Chair can rule upon the point of order:

Unless in continuance of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that this work is in progress there is no question. It has already been stated and ably stated that the Congress of the United States has passed a law appropriating $550,000 for the purchase of a site, upon condition that the city of Baltimore would contribute $50,000 to that object. The city of Baltimore has complied with that condition. The Government of the United States has already expended $550,000 for the purchase of a site. Under that the Secretary of the Treasury has directed his agents to clear away the property occupied by the citizens on that site and it is now almost ready for the erection of the building. At a later session Congress appropriated, at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury, a sufficient sum to pay for the plans and specifications necessary to proceed with this work of building a post-office in the city of Baltimore. Those plans have been accepted and the people who have been occupying the premises purchased by the Government have been notified to get away from there.

To-day the most beautiful spot in the city of Baltimore, one of the most beautiful cities on the seaboard, is a blot, so to speak, is a hole, or rather a series of holes, old cellars, that are left in pursuance of the intent and action of the Government in this regard. I claim that as a matter of economy this appropriation should be made, otherwise the expenditure of $554,000 will be without interest to the Government, if it is left for the next Congress to make an appropriation to take effect after the 1st of July, 1882.

If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] really means economy, (though I think this whole thing is a quibble,) then this amendment should be adopted, in order that the United States may progress with the work for which this purchase was intended, for the accommodation of the citizens of Baltimore. If it was only intended that the Government should make an investment in real estate, to be used at some other time, then the gentleman's quibble might have some force in it. But as it is, in my opinion it is simply absurd to split hairs now about this building not being authorized by law. An examination of the previous legislation will show that the purpose of appropriating at one time $550,000, and at another time $4,000, was to secure a proper site and to erect thereon a proper building for the accommodation of the citizens of Baltimore.

In other respects this Committee on Appropriations is drawing the line very closely. And if it is doing so for the purpose of economy, to make a showing of economy by this Congress upon which it can go to the people for political effect, it is a very poor policy to pursue, for there is no economy in it at all. If that is the purpose by which the gentleman is actuated, it will fail.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. YOUNG] must confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I am speaking to the point of order. I am arguing that this amendment of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] is germane and should be adopted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to have read for the information of the Chair and of the committee the proceedings in the Committee of the Whole and the decision of the chairman in the case referred to by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. RYAN,] as the Chair is informed that it runs on all fours with this. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read the debate and the decision upon the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RYAN. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the paragraph just read:

"Fifty thousand dollars for a building at Topeka, Kansas, of the kind and for the uses provided in the act of Congress entitled 'An act to authorize the purchase of a site for a public building at Topeka, Kansas,' approved March 3, 1875, and such building shall not cost to exceed $200,000."

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. RYAN. I ask the gentleman to reserve the point of order until I make a statement.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well; I reserve the point of order.

Mr. RYAN. I desire to state that in 1875 Congress passed a law providing for the purchase of a site at the capital of my State for a public building and appropriated $10,000 for that purpose. In pursuance of that law the site was purchased; the Government paid $10,000 for it and the citizens of the capital appropriated $10,000 more, making $20,000 invested in the site for the public building, in pursuance of that act of 1875. The State has also ceded jurisdiction over the property to the United States.

In the last Congress the Senate passed an appropriation of $50,000, limiting the cost of the building to $275,000, and that failed for want of action on the part of the House. During the present Congress the Senate passed a bill limiting the cost of this building to $200,000 and appropriating the sum of $100,000 to prosecute the work. That bill was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of this House and received its unanimous approval.

I only offered this amendment because it is not probable that the committee can be called at this session. I wish to state in addition that the State has already reached a population of nearly one million; there are but eight or ten judicial districts in the United States that have more business than the district of Kansas. I have been applied to, by letters from every judge of that judicial district; from the district judge, Foster, and the circuit judge, Dillon.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman from Kansas, but he is not discussing the point of order.

Mr. RYAN. Judge Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, who belongs to that district, has also written a letter to me to call the attention of Congress to the necessity of a public building there. There is no suitable place in Topeka now in which to hold the Federal courts, and because of that fact our State authorities have had to open the hall of the house of representatives, that the courts might be held there.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order that the last appropriation provided only for the purchase of a site, and not for the erection of a building.

Mr. RYAN. I should like to be heard upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. RYAN. The point of order is made against the amendment that it is obnoxious to a rule that I have not before me.

The CHAIRMAN. Rule 120.

Mr. RYAN. I have not got the rule before me, but I wish to say that, in my judgment, as a matter of law, the amendment is not obnoxious to that rule. In the first place, I will call the attention of the Chair to the phraseology of the act itself, showing that nothing but a naked appropriation is necessary to put the act into operation. The act itself does not provide what the cost of the building should be, but it provides that it shall be a fire-proof building for the use of the district and circuit courts of the United States, the post-office, the pension agency, the land agency, and other Government offices in that State.

The law only needs a naked appropriation to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to construct a building there, and hence I say that Congress has within the spirit of the rule already provided by law for the construction of this building. I say that this is a continuing appropriation, for the appropriation heretofore made provided for the purchase of the ground on which the building should be erected, which was as indispensable as any other part of it. Three things are indispensable in the construction of a building: First, the ground on which it stands; second, the material of which it is constructed; and, third, the labor and skill employed. And you can no more dispense with one of these things than all of them, and Congress has already made an appropriation of $10,000 to provide for the purchase of a site for this building, and hence I maintain that the amendment is not obnoxious to the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The language of Rule 120 is very specific. It is that "no appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law." And then the exception is made in these cases: "unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress."

Mr. RYAN. Permit me to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the point I make is that this appropriation of $10,000 for a site was as essential to the construction of this building as an appropriation for the material or the labor would have been.

The CHAIRMAN. That is undoubtedly true, but heretofore no provision has been made for the construction of a building and no such work is in progress. The rule requires that both of those conditions shall exist in order to make the amendment in order on an appropriation bill.

The Chair has before him the act approved March 3, 1875, which authorized the purchase of a site for this building, but it confers on the Secretary of the Treasury no authority whatever to contract for the erection of a public building, and the Chair is therefore bound to rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. PAGE. Who was in the chair at that time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE.]

Mr. CARLISLE. Now, if the Chair will allow me to say a word. While the case read is very much like the one now before the committee, it is not precisely like it in some very essential particulars. In that case there had been an appropriation to purchase a site, and nothing else.

Mr. BRAGG. I do not like to interrupt the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CARLISLE. The gentleman ought not to do it, then.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Before he explains the difference between the two cases, as he has the papers now in his hand, I desire to inquire of him whether he did not in the argument he made just now take the broad ground in favor of this amendment being received, independent of the exceptions he is now taking?

Mr. CARLISLE. I was under the impression that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] had heard my argument; but for his benefit I will repeat it before I take my seat.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire to say, that having heard his argument as advocate, I have also heard read his argument as judge, and I can distinguish between his argument as advocate and his argument as judge.

Mr. CARLISLE. In which capacity is the gentleman from Wisconsin now acting—advocate or judge?

Mr. BRAGG. Both.

Mr. CARLISLE. It is true that I said a little while ago, and I repeat it now, that after a further investigation of the rule, in my judgment, the purchase by the United States Government, under the authority of law, of a site for the express purpose, as specified in the act, of erecting a public building thereon, is a commencement of the work within the spirit of the rule.

Now, if I decided in that chair, or elsewhere, anything contrary to that opinion, my present opinion is that I decided erroneously. I am not one of those who regard consistency as the most precious of all jewels. I think that truth and right are more precious than the mere consistency of any individual. I would rather be right to-day than to be wrong all my life, even though I have to change my previously expressed opinions.

Now, in the case which has been read there was simply an appropriation for the purchase of a site, and nothing more.

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The law specified that the site was for the purpose of erecting a building for a specific use, and it prescribed what sort of a building there should be—a fire-proof building.

Mr. CARLISLE. So does this. I am undertaking to state to the Committee of the Whole and the chairman the points of difference between the two cases. In this case there is not only an appropriation for the purchase of a site for a particular purpose, but an appropriation for the preparation of plans and specifications for the building; and there is a direction by law to the Secretary of the Treasury to make out and submit to Congress an estimate for the construction of the building, which he has done. Any gentleman who will look at the regular estimates presented to the House by the Secretary of the Treasury will find an estimate for this identical public building at the city of Baltimore.

Now that makes a wide difference between this case and the other, although I have said, and I say it freely, without the slightest hesitation, that my present opinion, after a careful inspection of the rule, giving full meaning to the language "public works and objects" as used in the rule, is that when the Government has determined upon its object with reference to that public work, and has purchased the ground upon which to erect it, the case comes within the spirit, as I said before, if not within the strict letter of the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. TALBOTT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] one question. Did the Secretary of War in his case recommend an appropriation of money for the building?

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas. He had not prior to that time.

Mr. TALBOTT. That is the difference.

Mr. BURROWS. Let me state my question of order. The Chair said a moment ago that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky had expired. I desire to know under what rule debate on a question of order is limited. The limitation of the five-minute rule does not apply to debate on a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Committee of the Whole is proceeding under the five-minute rule, that rule applies not only directly to amendments but to all questions arising thereon.

Mr. BURROWS. The rule with regard to the five-minute debate is limited simply to amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. If the Committee of the Whole will come to order, the Chair will decide the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.] In this case Congress passed a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase a lot in the city of Baltimore for a post-office, the expenditure not to exceed $500,000. As the Chair understands, the provisions of that act have been complied with by the purchase of a site; and the condition required by the act, that the State of Maryland and the city of Baltimore should surrender their rights in the matter, has also been performed. It was further provided that the Supervising Architect should prepare a plan and specifications for a post-office; and a certain sum—$4,000 or $5,000—previously appropriated for the purposes of condemnation, and which had not been used, was directed to be expended, so far as necessary, in the preparation of the plan and specifications. There the law stops; that is the whole law on the question.

Now, take this case and compare it with the case of the public building at Topeka. The Government has bought the land; but there is no obligation on the part of the Government to go on and build upon it. A site has been purchased; but for aught that appears in the law the Government may not desire to use that site for twenty years. The Government has bought the site and required the Supervising Architect, its own officer, to make an estimate of the cost of constructing a building. But for aught that we know, if the estimate had been a very large one, Congress might have declined to build a post-office. It was for the information of Congress that the estimate was directed to be made, just as a private individual who is going to build a house obtains estimates of the cost. But when a man in the exercise of ordinary prudence obtains an estimate of the probable cost of a building before beginning its erection, that does not amount to a contract for the building. Hence in the opinion of the Chair the requiring of an estimate in the case of this building does not distinguish the case from that of the public building at Topeka.

Whatever might have been the opinion of the Chair, in the absence of the decision made by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] when acting in his impartial capacity as a presiding officer, yet in view of the decision that the appropriation for the construction of a building at Topeka was out of order, and in view of the acquiescence of the Committee of the Whole in that decision, the present occupant of the chair would feel very much embarrassed in undertaking to decide differently to-day. To show that the argument made to-day by the gentleman from Kentucky does not apply, the Chair will read the decision in the Topeka case, which will be found to run on all fours with this case:

Mr. RYAN. Permit me to call attention of the Chair to the fact that the point I make is that this appropriation of $10,000 for a site was as essential to the construction of this building as an appropriation for material or labor would have been.

That is the argument which the gentleman from Kentucky makes to-day. To that point the chairman, ruling on the Topeka case, replied:

That is undoubtedly true; but heretofore no appropriation has been made for the construction of a building, and no work is in progress.

Has any appropriation been made here for the construction of a building, or is any such work in progress?

The rule requires that both of those conditions shall exist in order to make the amendment in order on an appropriation bill. The Chair has before him the act approved March 3, 1875, which authorized the purchase of a site for this building; but it conferred on the Secretary of the Treasury no authority whatever to contract for the erection of a public building; and the Chair is therefore bound to rule the amendment out of order.

Now, is there in this case anything in the existing law that authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to contract for the erection of a public building? Nobody contends that there is. It will thus be seen that this case is entirely analogous with that decided by the gentleman from Kentucky when acting as chairman of the Committee of the Whole; and the present occupant of the chair, without expressing any opinion upon the correctness of that ruling, must in deference to the precedent then set and the action of the Committee of the Whole in sustaining it, rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. KIMMEL. However reluctant I may be to appeal from the decision of the Chair, there is——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise.

Mr. KIMMEL. For the purpose of appealing from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. KIMMEL. Cannot I be heard upon my appeal?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to speak on his appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. KIMMEL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. KIMMEL. Mr. Chairman, rules are instituted for the government of committees, of the Speaker, and of the House. But in the House resides the high prerogative of suspending these rules, or any of them, by two different modes: one of which is by a vote of two-thirds on certain Mondays of each month, and another by overruling the committee which has applied the rule to the exclusion of just measures, or by overruling the Chair when it applies the rule in like manner or as mere pro forma in respect to the rule which neither the committee nor the Speaker felt at liberty to disregard. Thus the House has wisely provided a rule for the guidance of the committee and the Speaker, whereby the country may be protected against unwise or corrupt legislation, most especially when attempted by surprise. The committee may be very properly restrained by the rule. The Speaker may render a pro forma decision in respect for the rule and the House may overrule both the committee and the Speaker without intending the slightest disrespect to either, because the House, which is the court of last resort, may in the exercise of its supreme power set aside its own law and try the cause on its merits. Now this amendment is in the form of an appeal from the committee to the House, from the law or rule to the merits or equity of the case, and I have reason to believe that many members if not all the members of the committee would willingly acquiesce in a relaxation of this rule as applied to this case. And I here in the presence of this House relieve myself of all suspicion of disrespect to the committee. The House may relax the rule which it may commend the committee for applying. The committee is the servant of the House. The House only changes for the time being in this particular case the instruction it has given to its servant. Let us now consider this particular rule under which this appropriation has been excluded from this sundry civil bill.

Rule XXI, third paragraph, reads:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

It is the committee's construction of the first paragraph of this rule which has induced it to rule out this appropriation. With the very highest respect for the committee, I find myself compelled to dissent from this construction, and will proceed to set forth the grounds of this dissent.

First. The rule holds that "no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, not previously authorized by law." Now, what is authorization? The rule does not prescribe any particular form in which such authorization shall be had; sometimes it takes on one form, sometimes another form, and, according to the construction of this committee, sometimes it takes on no form at all, as in the Harrisburgh case. In neither of these cases was this rule applied. Nor is it considered as necessary for the guidance of the Treasury, for in both of these cases the appropriations were made without this so-called authorization, and the money was paid out by the Treasury Department in compliance with the clause in the sundry civil bill without demur. And this very House, on a recent day of this very session, overruled the chairman on this, who decided that authorization was necessary by a vote of 101 to 78. Thus it appears that while this rule may be, and doubtless is, a most excellent rule for the government of a committee, the House has frequently relieved itself from the application. Although I might very well rest my case on this exposition of the rule and proceed to discuss its merits, I prefer rather to show, as I can show, that this amendment is not at all obnoxious to the rule, even as construed by the committee. I maintain that the authorization has been had precise, ample, and comprehensive, especially in view of the material purpose of the rule, which was to prevent hasty, unconsidered, and corrupt legislation by surprise—the only real purpose which common sense can extract from this rule, as far at least as I can understand it. Surprise is countervailed by notice. Notification as to the necessity for a post-office was made to this House by the action of the Appropriations Committee of the Forty-fourth Congress, 1874–'75, now nearly six years ago. The Forty-fourth Congress appointed a committee to investigate and report to the House, which report was unanimously in favor of the erection of a post-office in Baltimore City: "That Baltimore should be recognized by some practical action on the part of this committee."

June 20, 1878, the House appointed a commission to report to Congress the necessity for a building for a post-office in Baltimore, Maryland, the price for which a site for the same may be obtained, and the cost of such a building thereon as the needs of said city may require. Forty-fifth Congress, February 1, 1879, the commission appointed by the House reported as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 1, 1879.

SIR: In accordance with a provision in the act making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses, &c., approved June 20, 1878, authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury, the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, and the engineer officer in charge of the fifth light-house district, to examine into and report to Congress at its next session the necessity for a building for the post-office in Baltimore, Maryland, the price for which a site for the same can be obtained, and the cost of such a building thereon as the needs of said city may require, we have the honor to submit the following report:

The rapid increase of population of the city of Baltimore since 1850, (see table annexed marked A,) more especially during the present decade, affords conclusive evidence that the number of people who will receive and send their mails through the city post-office will at an early day be far in excess of the number that can be properly served with the present illy adapted accommodations. The truth of this statement is believed to be beyond dispute. The question presented, therefore, is whether the public and the increasing post-office business (see table marked B) can be properly accommodated in the building now occupied for this purpose. The post-office is now located in the custom-house building. By an examination of the table annexed marked C, it will be seen that every room in that building is now occupied. The rapid increase of the customs business in the city, as shown by table annexed marked respectively D, E, F, G, and H, arising from the extensive harbor improvements made by general and municipal governments, together with extended railroad facilities afforded to the granaries of the great West, will necessitate an early removal of many of the subordinate officers to afford the necessary room for transacting the business of the custom-house and sub-treasury proper. These facts being established, the question arises as to whether it is better to rent such a building as can be obtained to meet the demands for increased post-office accommodations or to construct a building, and to have thereby a choice of location and a building adapted in all respects to the public business to be transacted therein. It is our opinion, after a personal examination, that other and more extended accommodations for the post-office department in Baltimore are an absolute necessity, and that it would be advantageous to the United States to construct a building rather than rent premises for this purpose.

We would therefore recommend that the United States purchase a lot of sufficient size and erect thereon a post-office building of such size and plan as would best serve the public business of that office. It has been suggested that if a building should be constructed of sufficient size to accommodate the post-office business, with a proper regard to the continually increasing business of that office, and architectual effect in design and construction, that there would be much available space therein that would not be required for the Post-Office Department. In reply to this suggestion it may be said that such additional room can be advantageously used by other Government officers now occupying rented premises in the city, (see table annexed marked I,) and also by such officials other than custom officers who are now accommodated in the custom-house building.

A number of sites were inspected personally, and after much careful examination we believe that the square bounded by Baltimore, North Fayette, and Holliday streets, marked in blue in the accompanying map, containing one hundred and fifty-one feet by two hundred and eight feet, combines more advantages as to plan of building, access by street railroads, and centrality of location as to the business connected with the post-office than any other site. We have also to say that upon consultation with the following-named gentlemen, after our personal examination, and after reaching the above conclusion, namely, Hon. F. C. Latrobe, mayor; Decatur Miller, president of the Board of Trade; James Carey Cooles, president of the Merchants' Exchange; J. J. Middleton, president of the Corn Exchange; Walter B. McAtte, ex-president of the Corn Exchange; Colonel George W. F. Vernon, United States naval officer, and others, we ascertained that they heartily coincided in our views as to the advantages of this site. The estimated value of this property in 1875, as per report of William A. Potter, at that time Supervising Architect of the Treasury, was $329,000. We recommend that the property be acquired by condemnation.

In our judgment, with the present low price of material and the great scarcity of employment for deserving laborers, a building of suitable size, durability, and architectural effect, affording the accommodation so much needed, together with the site, can be provided for less than $1,000,000.

Very respectfully,

JOHN FRASER,
Acting Supervising Architect Treasury Department.
O. E. BABCOCK,
Brevet Brigadier-General United States Army,
Engineer Fifth Light-House District.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

[Indorsement.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 4, 1879.

While concurring in the view stated by the acting supervising architect and the engineer of the fifth light-house district as to the expediency of constructing the building proposed by them and the suitableness of the site, I respectfully suggest that in view of the number of important public buildings now in process of erection it is not advisable to make provision for this building at the present session, nor until the chief buildings now being constructed are completed.

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

First appropriation, first session Forty-sixth Congress, June 18, 1879: the House passed a law by which the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to purchase or condemn a site in the city of Baltimore, Maryland, for a building to be used for a post-office, court-house, and other public buildings, and appropriates $4,000 to pay the expenses of the same.

Second appropriation, second session Forty-sixth Congress, March 5, 1880, appropriates $550,000 for a site for a post-office in Baltimore, Maryland.

Third appropriation, second session Forty-sixth Congress, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to cause plans and estimates for said building, and appropriates $1,000 for the expenses of the same, which plans and estimates have been prepared and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Secretary of the Interior.

This, through six consecutive years, including three Congresses, two administrations, and two Secretaries of the Treasury, all concurring. Two commissions have reported in favor of this post-office. Five laws have been passed intended to authorize the building of a post-office in Baltimore. Three appropriations have been made for post-office in Baltimore, and the Secretary of the Treasury has prepared and submitted the plans and estimates to Congress, and the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Interior have approved the same for a post-office in Baltimore, and the Secretary asks for $300,000 for the further progress of the work. Under these several laws the site has been purchased, the titles have been secured to the Government, the plans and estimates have been made and submitted to Congress, the land has been entered upon, the right of ownership has been exercised, rents have been collected, buildings have been torn down, fences have been erected thereon, tenants have been notified to move from the premises. If this be not authorization, direction, and continuous appropriation for the construction of a public work now in progress, I admit that I do not understand either language or action. No judge fit for his duties would otherwise construe these laws. No jury fit for its duties would otherwise decide these facts. Here, too, I might well rest my case. I choose, however, to present another view of this rule. What is the meaning of the word objects in this rule, "for such public works and objects now in progress?" I take it for granted that the word has a meaning, or else no Congress would have placed it there, nor would three Congresses have permitted it to remain. It means that to which the desire is directed; that on which the purposes are fixed as the end of action or effort; that which is sought for; end, aim, motive, final cause. Then if this be the meaning of this word object in this rule, the object of all this continuous legislation, appropriation, ownership, and labor was and is the erection of a post-office in Baltimore City, and this amendment is continuation of appropriations for a public object now in progress, in exact conformity with the exact language of the rule. Will any gentleman on this floor so far jeopardize his character for intelligence as to assert that all this legislation, all these appropriations, all this action by high officials, whether by themselves or their agents, had for its object the purchase of a piece of land, however beautiful its location? I think not, sir. Opinion must have at least some show of reason on which to stand.

There is yet one other foundation on which this amendment stands deeper, broader, stronger than all those stated. It is this: this legislation forms a sacred contract between the Government of the United States and the corporation of Baltimore City. It will be remembered that the commission of 1879, of which the present Secretary of the Treasury was a member, reported in favor of the Baltimore street site, in accordance, as their report stated, with the opinions of the business men of Baltimore, and that the subsequent law authorized him to condemn any site he might select. For reasons satisfactory to himself, the Secretary selected another site and proceeded to negotiate for its purchase. The negotiation developed the fact that the new site would cost $600,000; one hundred thousand more than the law allowed. To meet this embarrassment the corporation of Baltimore City was required by the Committee on Public Buildings to contribute to the payment of this new site all above $550,000. In the performance of this condition the city of Baltimore contributed that portion of the new site which it owned, valued at more than $50,000, and on which stood the building for its water department and another for a part of its fire department. The removal of this building will subject the city to other large expenditures, approaching the large sum of one hundred thousand dollars, making the cost of this new site to the city $150,000. The city has performed its part of this contract; the deeds to this property are in the Government, and it is now about to remove its buildings. No lawyer here will deny that this legislation on the part of the Government and this delivery by the city to the Government of this valuable estate constitute a contract sacred in honor between these high contracting parties as it would be binding in law between individuals. Certainly no one will deny that this estate was conveyed to the Government not to give the Government a square of ground, but to secure the immediate erection of a post-office—not hereafter, but now. The first report on this subject, 1875, sets out that the impoverished condition of the Treasury had delayed the justice due to Baltimore in the matter of public buildings. Certainly this impoverishment no longer exists. The Secretary of the Treasury informed this House that the revenues of the Government would be seventy millions in excess of the Government's needs. Others estimate this surplus at one hundred million. The sum asked by this amendment is only one three-hundredth part of this sum. Will this House under cover of this rule repudiate the contract made by the Government with the city of Baltimore, more particularly when its own servants have reported so frequently that the public convenience demands that the building be erected at once? Nothing short of an adverse vote will shake my confidence in the self-respect of this House.

Nor is this all. The defect of this appropriation not only violates this contract, not only postpones the public convenience, but it disfigures the most beautiful locality in the lower portion of the city.

I have stated that the Secretary had recommended a certain site, and had selected another site, certainly much more beautiful, if not quite so convenient. It was quite natural that the Secretary should be impelled by taste and patriotism to locate this post-office on that site which would best illustrate the powers, wealth, and beneficence of the great Government he has the good fortune to represent at its Treasury. His selection accomplishes this end. This location is one short block from the main thoroughfare of the 400,000 people whose correspondence is to pass through this post-office. It is a large, open square in the center of the city, in the vicinity of which will be seen the new ground building of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad; the beautiful building of the Nothern Central Railroad; Barnum's Hotel, whose cuisine all travelers know so well; Guy's, where the luxuries of the Chesapeake tempt the taste; the residence of the late Reverdy Johnson, where graceful hospitality was dispensed to visiting statesmen however divergent their views; the old court-house, where for almost a century such lawyers as Pinckney, Wirt, McMahon, Taney, Nelson, and Johnson won for the Maryland bar its world-wide renown; and its fine old terrace, where Clay, Webster, Calhoun, Benton, Berrien, Douglas taught political truths in words that burn and thoughts that live, whose echo seems to linger around the beautiful monument that graces the center of the square, raised by grateful hands to the memory of the brave men who in 1814 fell in defense of the city against the veterans who followed Wellington from the Tagus to Waterloo. On the east side of this square was a row of the broad, high, red-brick, marble-trimmed dwellings which gave to this square a most imposing appearance. These dwellings are there no more. The Government has permitted their demolition. The débris only remains, fenced in with rough boards, on which the bill-poster sticks his revolting placards. Soon the other on this site will follow; and if this amendment fails, more débris, more board-fence, more revolting placards will disfigure this beautiful locality, to disgust the stranger and irritate the citizen.

Opposite the eastern front of this post-office stands the city hall, a magnificent structure of beautiful proportions, made of the finest marble, covering two and one-quarter acres of land, where most of the citizens have business, and all strangers pay their respects. Beyond this is another square where the old Holliday street theater invites the devotees of the drama. Will this House permit a longer disfigurement of such a locality by refusing the money necessary to enable the Government to fulfill its obligations. I cannot believe it will. Nor is this all. One of the conditions of this contract was that "the State of Maryland shall duly release and relinquish to the United States all jurisdiction over the said land or piece of ground, also all rights to tax or in any way assess said land or the property of the United States thereon," &c. Now, by this provision of this contract between these high-contracting parties the State of Maryland and the city of Baltimore are deprived of the right to tax five hundred and fifty thousand dollars' worth of real estate. Nor is this the only loss in this direction. The value of the surrounding property is depressed by this disfigurement and this delay. Property improvement is checked. Already the city authorities are taking steps for the erection of an additional court-house, to be on a scale commensurate with the plans and proportions of this post-office now in progress. Streets are to be widened and graded, so that the display of this great beneficence by the General Government may be aided by the responding munificence of the people of Baltimore. Sir, I will not believe that this House will skulk behind this strained construction of this rule as its excuse for such bold repudiation. One more plea—the public good!

Baltimore is the great central Atlantic city. It is third in commerce and practically fifth in population. It has direct connection with the ocean; two thousand miles of inland navigation and connection with every railroad in the Union. It has business relations with twenty-seven States. Its commerce floats on every ocean and casts its anchor in all the great sea-ports of the world. Here the loom and the anvil send their wares to be exchanged for the products of the field. Here northern capital and enterprise find southern men to buy their merchandise. Western push and pluck come to find outlet for groaning granaries, southern dash to find indulgences for its luxurious taste, and cosmopolitans to engage its tempting table and wooing wines. It lies on the border of the sections. Here northern vigor and southern suavity blend in social harmony. Sectionalism is ignored and prejudice ostracized. These are the elements which impelled its almost miraculous growth within the last decade. Being greater in business than in population makes the great disproportion between its general business and its public buildings. The United States building now in use in Baltimore was an old hotel converted into a custom-house and post-office more than forty years ago. Its post-office is a shed attached to the custom-house. A committee of the Forty-third Congress reported then:

> The committee would add further, in this connection, that up to this time no sufficient appropriation has been made for post-office accommodation, and the only building applicable to this object is a one-story structure, finished in the rudest possible manner, and seriously encroaching upon the space originally designed for the uses of the custom-house. Simple justice and a regard to public convenience would seem to demand that this important subject should not be longer postponed, and that the national claims of the city of Baltimore, as a leading commercial center, should be recognized by some practical action on the part of this committee.

The commission of the Forty-fifth Congress reported:

> We would therefore recommend that the United States purchase a lot of sufficient size and erect thereon a post-office building of such size and plan as would best serve the public business of that office. It has been suggested that if a building should be constructed of sufficient size to accommodate the post-office business, with a proper regard to the continually-increasing business of that office and architectural effect in design and construction, that there would be much available space therein that would not be required for the Post-Office Department. In reply to this suggestion it may be said that such additional room can be advantageously used by other Government officers now occupying rented premises in the city, (see table annexed, marked "I,") and also by such officials other than customs officers who are now accommodated in the custom-house building.

The Government officials at Baltimore have shown by figures the vast increase of its business. (See report appended.)

Although this marked increase in the business of Baltimore is due mainly to the short lines, yet somewhat of it ought to be credited to other causes.

Nor is this rate of increase diminishing. The certain result of all this is proportional increase of business correspondence and increasing facilities for post-office facilities; and especially in the money-order department, where the large sums in transitu require the greatest security. Every portion of this country is interested in the safe and expeditious transaction of the postal business at Baltimore. More than three-fourths of the districts represented on this floor have business connections with Baltimore. The social intercourse is still more extensive and intimate. Her children and their descendants are everywhere, and they turn to its hearth-stones as the Mohammedans turn to Mecca, when they pray. And Baltimore gives employment and homes to your children in return. All these considerations plead for unbroken faith in this contract you have made with Maryland and Baltimore. I believe you will maintain it untarnished.

The argument which induced this House to appropriate the money for the purchase of the site has been made vastly stronger for this appropriation for a continuation of the building. That site cost $550,000. The interest on that sum at 4 per cent is $22,000 per annum. Shall that sum lie useless there, or shall it be made to pay that interest by its use to the Government? Will any economist, however strict, advise the Government to waste this $22,000 per annum? Would not such advice forfeit his claim to such a character? Economy is a wise application of the means at command. Would that be wisdom? Rather, would not wise economy advise that the Government promptly appropriate the money to expedite the completion of this building, so that public business may proceed with the precision and dispatch due alike to the Government and the people? If it were wise to buy the site, it is much wiser to complete the building. Men of ordinary understanding cannot differ as to this opinion—it is too plain for dispute.

Now, there is yet one other point which I wish to make. It is well known to gentlemen who are familiar with the working of the rules that any attempt on my part to procure what gentlemen are pleased to call an authorization act, would have resulted in certain disaster. Those gentlemen know that such an attempt would have carried the bill to the Calendar, an infernal region "where they who enter leave all hope behind." And they also know if once on that Calendar, I would have been deprived of this opportunity to appeal to the broad common sense of this House—in this Committee of the Whole, where lay the only possibility of success. There was one other way perhaps, which was to move a suspension of the rules on the first Monday of this month. I need not recall to this committee the manner in which this was prevented. The introduction of the river and harbor bill as a private bill, destroyed that chance. I had no desire to avoid the usual mode to shirk the rules, to skip a committee; but, sir, I did have a great horror of being buried alive "unwept, unhonored, and unsung." If die I must, I choose to die on the field of battle and be buried with the honors of war. Thus only can I rest in peace.

[During the delivery of the above speech the following occurred:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. BURROWS. Under what rule does the Chair decide that the time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the five-minute rule, which applies to debate under which these amendments are being considered.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. The gentleman from Maryland is presenting his reasons why the appeal should be taken, and there is no limit to the debate, under the rules, on such a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The five-minute rule which applies to the discussion of amendments applies equally to all questions arising in the consideration of those amendments. It applies to the discussion of questions of order, if that discussion be permitted by the committee itself.

Mr. KIMMEL. How does the Chair decide?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the discussion on the appeal which the gentleman takes from the decision of the Chair must proceed under the five-minute rule. His five minutes have expired.

Mr. BURROWS. Under what rule?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BURROWS. I take an appeal from that decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. There can only be one appeal pending at the same time.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the Chair accommodate the committee by having the rule read limiting debate on points of order?

The CHAIRMAN. That does not vary the opinion of the Chair. It is the common rule of the committee that where debate is limited to five minutes, that limit of five minutes applies to every discussion arising in the committee. The Chair appreciates the position of the gentleman from Baltimore, and would like to hear him longer. While the Chair is compelled to rule in accordance with the universal practice that the debate is limited to five minutes, if debate on points of order be allowed at all, nevertheless if there be no objection the Chair will permit the gentleman from Baltimore to proceed with his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the gentleman, therefore, will resume the floor and proceed with his remarks.

Mr. KIEFER took the floor and yielded his time to Mr. KIMMEL, when he concluded his speech.]

Mr. KIMMEL. Here, sir, is a letter from the postmaster of the city of Baltimore, which describes the condition of that office. I will send it up to the Clerk's desk to be read, so that the committee may be informed of the exact condition of affairs existing now in that city.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the question of order which he has raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to the appeal. The necessity of a post-office in the city of Baltimore is certainly not a question touching the point of order.

Mr. KIMMEL. Very well; let the letter be read.

Mr. BRAGG. I make the point of order against the reading of the letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the vote is taken, [cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I want to say a word or two in this connection. The decision of this committee in reference to the question of order raised here goes, not to the Baltimore post-office alone, but to many appropriations in a bill involving some twenty-odd millions of dollars. This rule to which reference has been made here was established to protect the committee and the House against illegal propositions not previously authorized by law, and to protect the House against hasty legislation. I trust, sir, that a rule which has been rigidly adhered to from the Forty-fourth Congress until this time, a rule which has been found to work well, and which, as I have said, has been adhered to sacredly, earnestly, and uniformly up to this hour, is not to be set aside now in the interest of the construction of a public building in the city of Baltimore.

The gentleman speaks of the first proposition, as to the purchase of this land. It will be borne in mind, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KIMMEL] came to this House with a proposition to suspend the rules and appropriate $550,000 to buy a site for this building in Baltimore. Did not the gentleman act wisely? If he had come with an additional proposition, coupling with his demand for $550,000 to authorize the purchase of a site a provision appropriating for the construction of the building a sum not exceeding $2,000,000, would he have been likely to meet with the approval of the House? And when the proposition was made asking for a few thousand dollars to prepare a plan, if that had been coupled with a further proposition to authorize the construction of a building costing some two millions of dollars, does not the gentleman know that this rule of the House was in his way? What is there in this proposition in relation to plans and estimates? The gentleman says this building has been estimated for under a law of Congress. Not so, Mr. Chairman. The wording of that law is that the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to cause plans to be prepared for the said building and report to Congress at its next session the estimated cost of building the same. He was directed to send estimates of the cost of that building, and no more than that. What for? To go into this bill? By no means. None of these great buildings are constructed in a single year; but on the idea enunciated by the chairman of the committee a few minutes ago that the House might know what the building was to cost, might know what plan the architects would probably suggest for its consideration, and what the total cost would be, so as to determine whether the items covering such cost would be incorporated in the bill, or whether the building would be erected at all. But there was no provision for beginning work on such a building.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, we have a very stringent rule upon this subject, and if there can be no distinction made between this case and the Topeka case, perhaps the Topeka decision ought to be sustained.

But what is the rule? It provides—

> That no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

Now, there was an appropriation made for this purpose. There are two conditions here. The first is that it shall be in continuation of appropriations; and second, that it shall be in continuation of appropriations for objects already in progress.

Now, there was an appropriation, and that this is in continuation of the appropriation already made nobody denies. The question, therefore, is whether it is for an object already in progress. It has been argued that the Government was bound by this object when they had purchased the land.

Now, it is not necessary that the Government should be legally bound to that object. Nobody would contend that. But it is only necessary that when they made the appropriation it was directed to that object—not that they are bound by law; and if they made an original appropriation directed specifically for that object, then that object is in progress.

Then what did they do? They not only made an appropriation direct for this post-office in Baltimore, but they made it upon the express condition that the people of Baltimore, a separate municipality, taxing its own inhabitants, would cede the land or take action on their part for this specific purpose. That specific purpose has been complied with on the part of the city of Baltimore, by an actual expenditure of $50,000 of the money of the people of that city. Now, then, I do not say that binds the Government to this object, but I do say that it is evidence to every reasonable mind that when they made that appropriation they made it for this purpose or object, and that is the question here.

Now, if the appropriation was made for that object, is it not an object already in progress for which nearly five hundred thousand dollars has been expended? It is right that we should have these distinctions made. If we are going to have a strict rule, I am willing to live up to it. But wherever that rule in its strictness does not apply, there we ought to apply the principles of justice and of right. I will go as far as any man toward sustaining the decisions of the Chair upon these subjects, particularly when enunciated by occupants of the chair as careful as those who have made these decisions. But the point of departure in principle is always small. This decision does not apply to this case, because this appropriation was made for this object. It was what the appropriation was intended for. The money has been expended; the work is already in progress.

Mr. CARLISLE. Just one word. I desire simply to say that inasmuch as the gentleman who gave the decision which the Chair has caused to be read to the committee has publicly confessed he was wrong, and the present occupant of the chair has declined to express any opinion, the committee, I think, might very well sustain the appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair took this view. There was a great difference between the opinion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] in his official capacity, which is binding on the Chair, and the opinion of the gentleman from Kentucky on the floor, which binds nobody but himself. Therefore the Chair ruled as he did.

The question being taken, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee? there were—ayes 71, noes 69.

Mr. McLANE. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BLOUNT, and the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. KIMMEL.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 81.

The CHAIRMAN. The judgment of the Chair is not sustained by the committee. The Chair will submit the amendment, and directs the Clerk to again report it.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. FORT. As a friend of the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland, believing it ought to pass, I move to amend so as to make the amount $250,000. I think the House will agree to that amount and give to Baltimore what she so richly deserves, an appropriation to begin her post-office.

Mr. KIMMEL. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland proposes to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WARNER. I do not know what the estimate for this building is or what the plan is.

Mr. URNER. It is $300,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. For the entire completion of the work the estimate is $2,011,835.

Mr. FORT. What is that for a public building for a great city like Baltimore?

Mr. WARNER. I am not informed either as to the number of officials or other employés that will be accommodated in the building when it is constructed. But I do know that in the last fifteen years we have appropriated something like seventy million dollars for public buildings. This to provide room for how many officials or employés?

What is $2,000,000, it is asked, for a public building for a city like Baltimore? Well, it is a good deal. Not more, not nearly so much as has been spent on public buildings elsewhere; and that Baltimore needs a post-office building I do not question. But what assurance is here given that the cost before it is completed will not be twice two millions?

I have been looking a little into this matter of public buildings. I find that money has been appropriated in the same off-hand way, I presume, as it is proposed now to appropriate it, and buildings put up in which it has cost $100,000 to provide quarters for each Government official, and these not Departments of the Government or heads of Departments where the dignity and authority of the Government are, as it were, centered. I will give the cost of a few, as stated in the report of the Supervising Architect, with the number of Government employés provided for.

Custom-house and post-office at Saint Louis, Missouri: cost, $4,500,000; number of officials now employed and having office there, 32; that is, $140,000 for each one; or, deducting one-half as reasonable accommodations for the post-office and court-rooms for the public, and the cost for permanent quarters for each official or employé is $70,000.

Cincinnati, Ohio, custom-house and treasury, $3,390,000. The number of officials at present is 36; cost, about ninety thousand dollars each.

New York City, court-house and post-office, $8,550,000; with 77 officials and employés; over one hundred thousand dollars to each one.

Take some smaller places. I turn to Covington, Kentucky. Three hundred and forty three thousand dollars, with 11 Government employés.

Custom-house at Charleston, South Carolina: cost, $2,700,000; with 29 officials or employés; over ninety thousand dollars each.

These are a few out of many that might be referred to. And I think it would be a low estimate to say that, on an average, it has cost $20,000 to each officer and employé provided for in the public buildings constructed in the last fifteen years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the total wealth of this country It does not amount to $1,000 per capita of the population. What part of this total wealth is represented in the homes of the people in which they live, rear, and educate families? Probably not $1,000 to a family, on the average, and for the great mass of the people not much more than half that to accommodate five members to a family. And yet these must pay in the end the cost of these grand structures for a few to enjoy.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman thinks it would be cheaper to erect barns.

Mr. WARNER. No, sir. But let us know what we are doing. Let us construct buildings upon rational principles. Let us know when we undertake to erect a public building how it is to be built and what it is to cost. Let us know whether we are going to spend two, three, or five millions to accommodate twenty-five or fifty persons. I hold that the standard for the Government should be such as the people in the place where the building is to be erected afford for themselves for like purposes, and having some regard to the number of officials and employés to be employed there. I am opposed to voting for the construction of any public buildings until we know the plans and the cost, and until we know also that that cost is in some proportion to the cost of buildings erected for private purposes. For instance, in the city of Baltimore I would not vote money simply for architects to experiment with or to build themselves monuments out of. I see from plans given for the public buildings heretofore appropriated for that when an architect gets the money under his control he immediately sets out to imitate

> The hand that rounded Peter's dome,
> And groined the aisles of Christian Rome, instead of putting up a solid and substantial structure to accommodate business. I do not know why brick is not good enough for a building erected by the Government in most places. When we can come down to common-sense business principles in the erection of public buildings, and reduce the cost to what it ought to be, and might be, I shall be ready to vote money for public buildings where needed, but not till then.

Mr. FORT. This post-office is for the accommodation of the whole people of Baltimore.

Mr. WARNER. As my time has expired I desire to add some figures in connection with my remarks, and extend them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BLOUNT. I raised a question of order in relation to this public building, not because of any opposition I had to the sum proposed to be added to the bill, but because I felt and so did the committee feel that it was its duty to keep within the rules of the House in recommendations of this sort. That being overruled, this amendment being declared in order by the Committee of the Whole, I know of no reason why the appropriation of $250,000 should not be added for the purpose of constructing this building.

The question being taken on Mr. KIMMEL'S amendment, there were—ayes 88, noes 4.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Custom-house and court-house, Toledo, Ohio: For continuation of building, $100,000.

Mr. BELFORD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after line 66 the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a suitable site and erect thereon a suitable public building in the city of Denver, Colorado, for the accommodation of the United States district and circuit courts, post-office, land office, and other Government offices in said city; and for this purpose the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the point of order that there is no authority of law for such an appropriation.

Mr. BELFORD. I ask the gentleman to reserve his point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. We have lost so much time——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to hear the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will reserve my point of order for five minutes.

Mr. BELFORD. At the last session of Congress a bill passed the Senate making an appropriation of $50,000 for the erection of a public building in the city of Denver, State of Colorado. Colorado is the only State in this Union that does not possess a Federal building.

I want to call the attention of the House (for that is about all I can do) to the fact that during the last session of Congress gentlemen on the other side secured appropriations for public buildings at Montgomery, Alabama; Jackson, Mississippi; Paducah, Kentucky; Charlestown, West Virginia, and other places; and after they had got their legislation they announced a rule to this side, under the direction of the Speaker, by which no republican here could secure for his people needed and just legislation.

I want to call the attention of this committee to the receipts of the post-office at the city of Denver. During the year 1877 the post-office at Denver turned in to the Government the sum of $66,221.69; in 1878 the sum of $70,384.30; in 1879, $138,005.84; and in 1880, $214,954.93.

The money-order business in the city of Denver amounted in 1877 to $530,095.22; in 1878 to $751,569.28; in 1879 to $1,444,677.48; and in 1880 to $2,003,992.01.

Now, I say it is all right to have public buildings at Portland, Maine; Topeka, Kansas; Jackson, Mississippi; Montgomery, Alabama; Paducah, Kentucky, and other places. But I want to call the attention of the House to the difference between the revenue paid to the General Government by the city of Toledo, Ohio, and other towns for which, by reason of their ability to obtain the Speaker's eye and the votes of members upon this floor, they have secured the benefit of buildings erected at the Government's expense.

In 1879 Topeka, Kansas, turned in a net revenue of $27,485.36. During that same year Toledo, Ohio, turned in a net revenue of $70,585.33. My friend from Ohio [Mr. HURD] succeeded in getting in under the blanket at the close of the last session and secured his appropriation. In 1879 Indianapolis turned in a net revenue of $71,480.94; Portland, Maine, $46,736.84; Kansas City, Missouri, $78,273.32; Wilmington, Delaware, $18,566.80; Charleston, South Carolina, $41,546.28; Atlanta, Georgia, $30,323.94; Trenton, New Jersey, $26,307.69; Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania—and Pennsylvania is the State honored by the present Speaker of this House, and naturally comes in for a little recognition on the part of this great legislative body—Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, paid in a net revenue of $165,097.61. Denver, Colorado, turned in $175,467.74. Yet that State has not a public building within its limits. Colorado has turned into the national Treasury $1,600,000; but its Representative here, among all the diseases that are contagious, has not been able to catch the disease known as the Speaker's eye. [Laughter.]

I know this amendment will be ruled out of order; but I want to call the attention of the country to the fact that this democratic Congress has feathered its own nest; has provided appropriations for Montgomery, and Jackson, and Charleston, and wherever they could find a place to spend the people's money. Yet the total postal receipts from the State of Colorado are more than double those of West Virginia, and exceed those of Rhode Island, New Hampshire, Vermont, Delaware, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Nebraska. But the State is one of the States of the far West, and is too weak on the floor of this House to have any hope of recognition by the Speaker. I say that I am the victim of misplaced generosity. I asked to-day for only $10,000 to help develop the arid lands of the West, and I was voted down.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read the following:

For the preservation of public buildings in Alaska, $8,000.

Mr. HOSTETLER. I move to amend by inserting after the paragraph just read the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to purchase a site and erect a public building at Terre Haute, Indiana, for a post-office and for the safe-keeping of the public records and of the revenue collector at that point.

Mr. BLOUNT. I make a point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOSTETLER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just ruled on a similar question, and does not desire to hear any argument.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move to amend by inserting after the pending paragraph that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the following sum be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of a Government building at Baton Rouge, Louisiana, upon plans which will insure its completion for the sum of $35,000, the half of which is hereby appropriated.

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the point of order that that amendment is in substance the same as a bill now pending on the Calendar of the House, and that there is no authority of law for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to insert the following:

For the extension of the Philadelphia Mint, $400,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise the point of order that that amendment is a change of existing law and does not retrench expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know what the existing law is.

Mr. BLOUNT. The existing law authorizes the construction of that building on a certain plan; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] by his amendment proposes to change that plan so as to extend the building.

Mr. O'NEILL. My amendment proposes an extension of the Philadelphia Mint building and the expenditure of $400,000 for that purpose. The Philadelphia Mint is an existing institution, a Government Department in Philadelphia. That building is very inadequate for the work to be done inside its walls. I think the Government should so improve this building as to afford it facilities for performing its work effectively.

Those who have the charge of the working of the Mint at Philadelphia, the superintendent and others, recommend this extension, and the Committee on Mines and Mining of the House of Representatives and the Finance Committee of the Senate have reported bills upon the subject. There is evidently a great necessity for this work. I do not know whether in the closing hours of this session we will be able to do anything in the way of securing the necessary appropriation for the purpose.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to add to my point of order that there is now pending before the House a bill upon this same subject.

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes, sir; there is the great trouble. There is a bill now pending in the House; and I do not believe it can be reached although I hope it may and I will do what I can to get it up. I am very anxious about this appropriation because I think the Mint at Philadelphia should be extended upon the spot where it now stands. There may be some who desire to change the present location of that building and to erect an entirely new Mint in some other part of the city of Philadelphia. I want it to remain just where it is, where property can be purchased at a fair rate, where the building can be extended so as to afford ample accommodations for the work of the Government and not take immense sums of money to do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania admits that there is pending before the House a bill substantially the same in effect as this amendment; therefore, the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. It will be remembered that the charge or the insinuation has been made here that Pennsylvania could get anything. [Laughter.] Now, I am very much afraid that I am not going to succeed in this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope, however, that the committee will overrule the Chair if the point of order is made.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. O'NEILL. Oh, no, sir; upon reflection I think it would be useless.

Mr. PACHECO. I move to amend by inserting after the pending paragraph the following:

Court-house and jail at Santa Fé, New Mexico: For continuation of building, $50,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve a point of order on this amendment.

Mr. PACHECO. The Government has already appropriated something like seventy-five thousand dollars for a building at this point, and I believe something more than thirty thousand dollars has been employed in erecting this court-house and jail at Santa Fé. I am sorry the Delegate from New Mexico is not present; he left here some days since; but he requested me to obtain at least an expression from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations on this subject.

Mr. BLOUNT. There is a bill pending before the House for this purpose. I therefore make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to know the facts in this case.

Mr. PACHECO. This is for a continuation of a work. An appropriation has already been made; and in view of the vast interests——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman from California whether at the place indicated there is work in actual progress now under authority of the Government?

Mr. PACHECO. I do not think there is.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PAGE. It may be that there is a bill pending on this subject, but it may not express the precise point of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not rule out the amendment on that ground, but on the ground that, according to the statement of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PACHECO,] there is now no continuing work being done under the order of the Government; so that this is in the nature of a new work.

Mr. PACHECO. I will ask the gentleman in charge of this bill whether he knows why a provision of this sort was not inserted in the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will answer the gentleman, if the point of order should not be sustained. I do not wish to consume the time of the Committee of the Whole unnecessarily.

Mr. PAGE, (to Mr. BLOUNT.) Was there ever a Government building at that point?

Mr. BLOUNT. There was before the war; but it has been abandoned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ruled on the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fire-proof extension of the Government Printing-Office building, and a stable, including heating apparatus and plumbing, to be erected on property now belonging to the Government, upon plans approved by the Architect of the Capitol, $40,000, the work to be done under his direction; said appropriation to be available during the present fiscal year; and any expenditure on a plan that shall cost a greater sum to complete it shall be deemed unlawful.

Mr. ROBINSON. For the purpose of putting a question to the gentleman in charge of this bill, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to know whether the last provision of the paragraph just read is not something that appears in our legislation for the first time?

Mr. BLOUNT. The provision came from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I believe there was some suggestion that it was liable to a point of order. But it has been inserted in the bill, and is now before the House. I make no question of order upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman does not understand my point.

I am not speaking of the whole paragraph, but only of this language at the close:

And any expenditure on a plan that shall cost a greater sum to complete it shall be deemed unlawful.

That seems to me a very novel provision.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all. In 1880 it was in the bill in which there was an extension for about the same amount. The provision is of frequent occurrence.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts make any point?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have moved an amendment to strike out the last word. My suggestion, in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, is that all this provision can accomplish would be a notice to the Architect that in the judgment of Congress $40,000 is sufficient for the purpose. But suppose the Architect proceeds with the work, proposing to spend $40,000 upon the plan which he adopts; and suppose after the work has run on for some time there should be a change in the price of labor or the cost of materials, is the Architect to be considered as guaranteeing the sufficiency of this appropriation at the risk of making himself liable for malfeasance in office if the cost should exceed this sum?

Mr. BLOUNT. There can be no difficulty of that kind in this matter. If, after the plans and estimate are made at given figures, there is a change in the value of labor or materials, the practice has been for Congress to extend the limit of the appropriation when in its judgment it sees fit to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then these lines are of no force at all. The meaning intended would be properly expressed in this way:

And provided, That the whole expense contemplated by such plan shall not exceed the sum hereby appropriated.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is the purpose and effect, I think, but it is important it should be put in the way in which it is in this bill. It is intended for the purpose of restraining the Architect. It gives him notice that he shall not go beyond the appropriation made. It has been the practice of Congress to make such limitations, and I do not see why we should change the language here in this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not propose to make any further amendment or to do any more about it than to emphasize it at this point as improper language to be in the bill. If hereafter any trouble shall arise to the Architect in consequence of this language, I want him to have this protection at least that some one protested against the use of this language in the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is satisfied with it and, indeed, it was inserted in the bill at the suggestion of that committee.

Mr. COOK. The plan and specifications for the construction of this fire-proof extension of the Government Printing Office building and stable were drawn up by Mr. Clark, the Architect of the Capitol, and he never yet has made any plan and specifications for any building that has not come within the amount appropriated by Congress for that purpose. He has not been one of those gentlemen who assumed after the appropriation was made to go outside of it and beyond the law. This language was inserted in the bill at the suggestion of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not say as to the Architect of the Capitol, but only that there was objection to such legislation in an appropriation bill.

Mr. COOK. The Committee on Appropriations put the paragraph in at the suggestion of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ROBINSON. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COOK. I hope the motion to strike out the last word will not prevail.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have withdrawn that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the erection of a light-house and fog-bell on Whale Rock, at the entrance of Narragansett Bay, Rhode Island, $35,000.

Mr. PACHECO. I move the following amendment:

After line 116 insert the following:
"For the erection of a light-house and fog-bell at San Luis Obispo Point, San Luis Obispo Harbor, California, $35,000, the same to be immediately available."

Mr. Chairman, this is one of the most important points on the whole Pacific coast. It is two hundred and fifty miles south of San Francisco. We have no harbor of refuge there whatever. A great and prosperous trade is growing up on that coast. Severe storms often prevail, and this protection should be afforded to the mariners who navigate that coast. I hope there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. That provides for the expenditure of money immediately.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman make the point of order before the gentleman from California discussed his amendment?

Mr. BURROWS. I make the point that the point of order comes too late.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserved all points of order.

Mr. BURROWS. I did not so understand the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Georgia reserved the point of order, it comes in time. For the reason alleged, the Chair rules out the amendment.

Mr. PACHECO. On what ground?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any law providing for the erection of any such light-house?

Mr. PACHECO. I do not think there is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the construction and establishment of a light-ship on Five Fathom Bank, in Delaware Bay, $50,000.

Mr. BERRY. I move to insert the following:

For the construction of a light-house at Point Saint George, California, $200,000.

I wish to say a word in reference to that amendment, which has been recommended by the Light-House Board.

Mr. BLOUNT. I reserve all points of order.

Mr. BERRY. It is a well-known fact, Mr. Chairman, that the Pacific coast is a dangerous one; it is a rock-bound coast. It is also well known that it is not well lighted. At Point Saint George there is a dangerous reef, where many vessels have been wrecked. It was there the ship went down with General Wright and the entire crew were lost. Nor is that the only catastrophe which has taken place at that point. The Light-House Board recognized the fact that it is a dangerous point, and it accordingly recommended the construction of a light-house there.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Commerce has considered the proposition, and recommended a light-house should be constructed there. They referred the matter to the Committee on Appropriations, in order that they might incorporate in this very bill an appropriation for constructing the work. I hope, sir, no point of order will be raised against it, but that the amendment will be permitted to go into the bill, in order that the commerce of that coast may be protected and the safety of the lives of the seamen who navigate the coast secured.

Mr. BLOUNT. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no law authorizing the erection of this light-house, the Chair will be compelled to rule it out.

Mr. BRIGGS. When was the point of order raised?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia reserved all points of order. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the amendment is ruled out.

Mr. BRIGGS. I shall feel it to be my duty hereafter when the point of order is raised to object to any debate upon the merits of the proposition. I do not see the least reason for discussing the merits of a proposition on which the point of order has been made and which it is likely will be ruled out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire is perfectly right, and the Chair hopes the gentleman having charge of this bill will insist on raising his point of order when a proposition has been read, for if the amendment is to be ruled out the time occupied in the discussion of the merits of the proposition is just so much time lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move the following amendment:

For rebuilding the light-house at Bayou Lacomb, on Lake Pontchartrain, in Louisiana, $5,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would suggest to my friend that this is not a proper place for that amendment to come in. There is already an appropriation in this bill, a large sum provided, for the erection of light-houses, and it might be proper to insert it at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia make a point of order upon it?

Mr. BLOUNT. I merely stated that it is not proper at this portion of the bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON. This provision should be incorporated in the bill in some shape. The light-house at that point has been destroyed by fire.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not think that this is a proper place for it. The building has been destroyed, and some provision should be made perhaps for its rebuilding. I do not make the point of order upon it, however, but simply suggest that it should be withheld for the present.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Then I withdraw the amendment for the present.

The Clerk read as follows:

For range-lights on Sturgeon Bay, Wisconsin, $11,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to offer an amendment from the Committee on Appropriations at this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 135 insert the following:
"For completing the Cape Henry light-house station, Virginia, $25,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRENTS. I offer an amendment to come in after the amendment just adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

The money heretofore appropriated for establishing a fog-signal on Sandy or West Point, Puget Sound, shall be applicable to the establishment and construction of both a light-house and fog-signal at that point.

Mr. BRENTS. This makes no appropriation; it simply changes the plan heretofore adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman if that has been recommended by the Light-House Board?

Mr. BRENTS. I do not know any further than from my own conversation with Colonel Farquhar, chief of the Light-House Board. He requested it to be done.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to it myself.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Engraving and printing:

For labor and expenses of engraving and printing, namely: For labor, (by the day, piece, or contract,) including labor of workmen skilled in engraving, transferring, plate-printing, and other specialties necessary for carrying on the work of engraving and printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, the pay for such labor to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury at rates not exceeding the rates usually paid for such work; and for other expenses of engraving and printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States; for materials, including paper required in the work of engraving and printing; for purchase of engravers' tools, dies, rolls, and plates, and for machinery and repairs of same; and for expenses of operating macerating machines for the destruction of the United States notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other obligations of the United States authorized to be destroyed, $350,000.

Mr. GILLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after "dollars," in line 219:

"Provided, That all money used for the manufacture or purchase of paper for printing and preparing national-bank notes, and all wages or salaries paid those who supervise or do the work, and all expenses of destroying mutilated or condemned national-bank notes, shall be charged up to and collected from the banks for which they are prepared or destroyed."

Mr. VALENTINE. I make the point of order that it comes too late.

Mr. BLOUNT. I raise a question of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. The law is substantially the same as this; but this changes it in some of its details. It provides for the laboring element in it, &c. I do not think it is a proper amendment to be incorporated here.

Mr. SPARKS. But it reduces expenditures.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not think it does, though I am not particular about that. I do not care to press the point of order against it.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Chairman, this provision which has been read, and which I wish to amend, appropriates a large sum of money for this identical expense, a part of which my amendment will bring back into the Treasury. The point of order therefore cannot hold, for it is perfectly germane to the bill under consideration and to this clause, and it would retrench expenditures.

The gentleman from Georgia says this is substantially the law as at present existing. I beg leave to say it is not the law. The Government pays out of the Treasury this expense, and does not receive back from the national banks a single dollar because of it, excepting the cost of the plates. The banks are at liberty to surrender their circulation, sell their bonds, and again deposit other bonds and call for new currency, to be issued at the expense of the Government. They may make a vast amount of expense to the national Treasury by surrendering their notes and calling for new ones.

To demonstrate the truth of my statement and to show the outrageous abuse of their privileges by the banks, I quote two paragraphs from the annual report of the Treasurer of the United States, Hon. James Gilfillan, of November 1 last. He says on pages 20 and 21 under the head "Reduction and increase of bank circulation:"

Banks which have applied in vain to the Treasurer for the surrender of their legal-tender deposits have accomplished the same object by obtaining new circulation. The cost of printing the new notes thus issued is borne by the United States; so that the Government, though not deriving the remotest benefit from the transaction, has been obliged to bear the whole expense of their issue and a part of the expense of their redemption simply to enable a bank to do by indirection what it was not permitted to do directly. In several instances banks have repeated the operation of reducing and increasing their circulation several times within a brief period, taking up their bonds and selling them, it would appear, whenever the premium constituted a sufficient inducement, and increasing their circulation again whenever bonds could be bought at better rates, the United States all the while redeeming their notes at its own expense or that of the other banks, and issuing others also at its own expense whenever called upon by them.

An example will better illustrate these operations. In January and February, 1875, a certain bank reduced its circulation from $308,490 to $45,000 by deposits of legal-tender notes. Between September 26, 1876, and May 26, 1877, and before that deposit was exhausted, it increased its circulation to $450,000. Between August 14 and September 10, 1877, it again reduced its circulation to $45,000. On September 19, 1877, nine days after completing the deposits for this reduction, it again began to take out additional circulation, although $402,550 of prior deposits remained in the Treasury, and by the 26th of that month its circulation had again been increased to $450,000. July 22, 1878, it, for the third time, reduced its circulation to $45,000, and in August and September, 1879, again increased it to $450,000, at which it now remains, the balance of its former legal-tender deposit then in the Treasury being $112,615. From January 13, 1875, to the date of this report, $778,275 of its notes have been redeemed, of which only $40,700 were redeemed at the expense of the bank, although, during more than one-third of that period, it had outstanding and was deriving the benefit from the full amount of circulation which its capital authorized. The only assessments which have been made on the bank for the expenses of redeeming its notes were $24.74 in 1875, and $4.39 in 1878. At one time there were in actual circulation $852,550 of its notes, although the highest amount ever borne on its books was $450,000.

I think every member on this floor will be satisfied that this amendment should be incorporated in the bill. There is no reason on earth why this Government should give the national banks this priceless privilege of having half the paper currency and controlling its volume, and at the same time run printing presses and manufacture paper for them and pay all the expenses of preparing their notes for circulation. It is like giving the banks all the gold in the country, and then coining it over and over for them at the expense of the people. This paper money that we donate to them is worth as much as gold because of the national credit and laws behind it.

Mr. PRICE. Is this discussion upon a point of order or on the amendment?

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not raise a question of order against it.

Mr. PRICE. Then I wish to reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa. I hold in my hand a letter from the Comptroller of the Currency upon this very question. It will be remembered by gentlemen of the committee that some time since this identical question was raised, and I then asserted that all of the expense of sorting, transporting, and destroying the issues of national banks was paid by the banks themselves. I asserted then and assert now that every character and description of expense is paid by them. That assertion was called in question on the floor, and I took the trouble to get a letter from the Comptroller covering the grounds. I will read a portion of that letter.

Mr. VALENTINE. I would like to inquire if the point of order is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order has been made.

Mr. VALENTINE. I made a point of order at the time that the amendment was offered, but I am not sure the Chair recognized it.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman rose to make a point of order the Chair will certainly hear it.

Mr. VALENTINE. I made the point of order that the amendment came too late. The Clerk had proceeded to read the following section before this amendment was offered.

Mr. GILLETTE. I was doing my utmost to attract the attention of the Chair at the time the Clerk commenced to read the next paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remembers very well that the gentleman from Iowa was on his feet although the Chair was not aware that it was his purpose or intention to attract the attention of the Chair. The Chair, however, recognizes the right to offer the amendment and overrules the point of order.

Mr. PRICE. Then I call the attention of the House to this letter. The Comptroller of the Currency says:

In reply to your verbal request you are referred to section 3 of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, which provides that "each of said associations (national banks) shall reimburse to the Treasurer the charges for transportation, and the costs for assorting such notes * * * and the amount assessed upon each association shall be in proportion to the circulation redeemed, and be charged to the fund on deposit with the Treasurer."

And this fund on deposit with the Treasurer is put there by the national banks.

In compliance with this provision of law the national banks have been annually assessed in proportion to the circulation redeemed, and the banks in operation have not only paid the expense of redeeming their own notes, but also for the redemption of the notes of associations which are reducing their circulation, which have gone into voluntary liquidation, and which have become insolvent.

By reference to page 19 of the Treasurer's report for 1880, it will be found that the annual cost to the national banks has been at the rate, on an average, of $37.69 for banks having a circulation of $90,000, or $188.45 annually for a bank having a capital of $500,000, with the amount of circulation authorized by law.

The whole expenses for redemption during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1880, were $143,729.39, all of which was paid by an assessment upon the national banks.

It was all so paid, in every shape and form, by an assessment on the national banks. There is not a dollar paid by the Government in any shape or form for paper, for printing, for material, for transportation, for assorting, for maceration, or anything of that kind that is not paid by the national banks. And it is about time that men who talk about finance on this floor or off it understood at least a little of what they were talking about.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I move to strike out the last word.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that gentlemen are very reckless in proposing amendments. I know that on several of the bills passed at the last session amendments were presented and adopted which have worked great hardship to individuals.

Now, as I read this provision, the appropriation is for—

Engraving and printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States.

And the other provision is for destroying United States notes, bonds, national-bank notes, &c. And the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] would make the national banks pay the whole expense of destroying the bonds and securities of the United States. Why? Why did he propose such an amendment? It has no place here, and I wonder that any gentleman on the floor of this House would, for one moment, give it his serious consideration.

Mr. GILLETTE. This bill provides for printing these notes and I submit the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] did not find anything in the letter which he read to this House nor can he obtain from the Department anything to justify his statement that the national banks pay directly to the Treasury for the expenses of printing their notes. And the gentleman who has this bill in charge is so well satisfied that my amendment was germane to this section of the bill that he withdrew his point of order and did not insist on it. Both these gentlemen state that the law now provides for the payment by the banks of all the expense of preparing national-bank notes. In reply I defy either of them to produce the law to sustain their assertions. They cannot do it. There is no such law, while the law which compels the Comptroller of the Currency to prepare these notes is section 5171 of the Revised Statutes. It is mandatory, and so plain that a child can understand it.

Mr. MANNING. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BLOUNT. Just a single word. I wish simply to say that the banks do pay for the expense of printing their notes already and I trust this crude amendment will not be inserted in the bill.

The question being taken on Mr. GILLETTE's amendment, there were ayes 12, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following:

Repairs of light-houses: For repairs and incidental expenses of light-houses and stations; for rebuilding, renovating, and improving the same, and buildings connected therewith; for the establishing and repairing pier head-lights; and for the purchase and repair of illuminating apparatus and machinery, $310,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 253 insert:
"Of which sum $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be applied to the rebuilding of the light-house on Sharp's Island in Chesapeake Bay."

Mr. TALBOTT. I ask the gentleman from Georgia so to modify his amendment as that the appropriation shall be made available at once. That is the most important light-house on Chesapeake Bay, and it was washed away during the recent ice freshet.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no objection to that, and will modify the amendment accordingly.

The amendment, as modified, was adopted.

The Clerk read the following:

For the collection of statistics relative to the annual production of the precious metals in the United States, $5,000, to be expended under the direction of the Director of the Mint.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] what law there is authorizing this? If this appropriation is to be made under the law of last year, this changes that law. I make the point of order that the law last year provided this money should be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who ought to have the control of this expenditure.

Mr. BLOUNT. The point of order the gentleman from California makes, that this changes existing law, is correct. The Committee on Appropriations made the change because it was thought the present Director of the Mint, being a very efficient officer and in accord with the Secretary of the Treasury, should be charged with the expenditure of this money. We did not know what changes might be made, and concluded we should modify the paragraph in this way. If the gentleman insists on the point of order, it will be sustained.

Mr. PAGE. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Now let us hear how the paragraph will read, the point of order being sustained.

Mr. PAGE. I only make the point of order with reference to that portion of the paragraph which provides that the sum here appropriated shall be expended under the direction of the Director of the Mint. I do not oppose the appropriation. I am willing it should be as last year, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WARNER. The Director of the Mint is the proper officer to gather these statistics, and would do it at any rate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules out of order the amendment as submitted by the gentleman from Georgia in this bill. The existing law would leave the expenditure of this money in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SIMONTON. I wish to inquire of the Chair, how can a point of order be sustained with reference to part of a proposition without taking the whole proposition with it? Does not the point of order go to the whole proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from California to move to strike out so much of the paragraph as relates to this money being expended under the direction of the Director of the Mint.

Mr. SIMONTON. He did not move to strike out anything, but made a point of order which applies to the whole paragraph.

Mr. PAGE. If the committee will consent that the words "Director of the Mint" be stricken out and the words "Secretary of the Treasury" be inserted, I have no objection to the paragraph.

Mr. BAKER. Either the whole paragraph must go out or else the only remedy is to take the sense of the committee on an amendment. If the gentleman from California supposes that the Director of the Mint is not the officer to be charged with the expenditure of this amount, let him offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. PAGE. If the Chair rules this paragraph in order, I will move to strike out "Director of the Mint" and insert "Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope that will not be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to withdraw the point of order and to move an amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. PAGE. I propose to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to strike out all after the word "dollars" and leave it there.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am unwilling to do that. I am here representing the Committee on Appropriations to support the provision as reported in the bill. It is deemed to be very important that this matter should be left under the control of the Director of the Mint, whose investigations have been very valuable. The idea of the committee was to give to him the control of this fund.

Mr. PAGE. My reason for making this point of order is, that the money expended by the Director of the Mint should be under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Director of the Mint is a bureau officer in the Treasury Department, and the law has always made the expenditure of sums of money of this character a matter for the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and there is no reason why it should be taken from him in this case.

If the Committee on Appropriations are determined that this money shall not be appropriated unless it is to be expended under the direction of the Director of the Mint, then I will insist upon my point of order and let this paragraph go out of the bill. If they are willing to change it so that the money shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, I am willing that that should be done. But I am unwilling that this appropriation shall stand as it now is in this bill, to be expended under the direction of the Director of the Mint.

The CHAIRMAN. Did not the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] some time since withdraw his point of order?

Mr. PAGE. I have never done so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. PAGE. I made the point of order in good faith.

Mr. BAKER. Then let the whole paragraph go out.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the paragraph will go out of the bill.

Mr. PAGE. I move to amend by inserting the following in place of the paragraph just ruled out:

For the collection of statistics relative to the annual production of the precious metals in the United States, $5,000.

Mr. BAKER. I make the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PAGE. The Chair certainly will hear me on the point of order. My amendment is not subject to a point of order. The appropriation bill of last year had in it a provision appropriating $5,000 for this purpose, and my amendment is in pursuance of the law of last year, in exactly the same language. I move to insert in place of the paragraph ruled out under my point of order these words:

For the collection of statistics relative to the annual production of the precious metals in the United States, $5,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit that the amendment is subject to a point of order in this: the provision in the appropriation bill of last year was designed simply to enable certain investigations to be made and certain information to be collected during the year, the money to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Committee on Appropriations this year were induced to submit to the House the proposition that the appropriation for this purpose should be expended under the direction of the Director of the Mint. I submit that the amendment offered is just as much without authority of law as was the proposition in the bill which has been ruled out of order. The one proposition rests upon as little authority of law as the other. They were simply propositions for an appropriation for a given year.

The appropriation for this purpose was omitted for many years. Then, again, before that time it was inserted in various bills. There is not a single scintilla of law more for the proposition which the gentleman now offers than for the one which has been ruled out.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman mistakes the point of order I made and which has been sustained. The paragraph was ruled out of order on the ground that it changed existing law; not because there was no law providing for an appropriation for this purpose, for there is such a law, and it is contained in the appropriation bill of last session. I will modify my amendment so that it shall be in the precise language of the law of last year.

Mr. BLOUNT. The point I make is——

Mr. PAGE. The point upon which this paragraph was ruled out was that it changed existing law.

Mr. BAKER. It is true that last year a sum of money was appropriated for a specific, definite object, confined to that year. But there is no law anywhere on the statute-book which provides that any Department of the Government shall be charged generally and continuously with this particular work. To make this provision in order it must be for the continuation of a public work, and in order that it shall be a continuing public work it must be authorized by some law that is continuous. The fact that there was an appropriation made last year does not make this a continuous object. It can only be made a continuous object, under the sense of the rule and the law, when there is a statute authorizing that particular object to be carried on by some Department of the Government. No such statute has ever been passed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have merely a word to say touching this point of order. It has been already decided on similar questions by chairmen of the Committee of the Whole during this session. Last year this appropriation was made leaving out the words "under the direction of the Director of the Mint." I will read it:

For the collection of statistics relating to the annual production of the precious metals in the United States, $5,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

That is existing law; it is now operating. This is no change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair asks the gentleman from Illinois this question: After that sum of money had been expended for the purpose referred to, could that work be further continued under that law?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It is not necessary that it should be, under the rule. If the Chair will read the rule he will find that it only operates against appropriations that change existing law. Now, the appropriation I have just read is existing law. During this session this precise point has been made; and it was held—the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] being then in the chair—that such a provision was in order. This is a continuation for next year of an appropriation for the precise purpose of a work now in progress under existing law.

Mr. WARNER. For twenty years, under some provision of law, this information has been collected; and no information furnished by the Government from any source is of more importance, not only to the country, but to the world. I hope the provision will not be struck out on a point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman is mistaken. For many years this provision has been omitted.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, this work, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] states, was begun many years ago. For many years it was conducted by Mr. Rossiter W. Raymond, who prepared the publication on the mineral resources of the country. Afterward the work was transferred to the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. This bill proposes to transfer it to the Director of the Mint. I do not care particularly who has charge of the work. I am sorry, however, that the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] made the point of order on which the provision was thrown out of the bill, for that action strikes against his own State and against all the Territories. The provision is simply to furnish Congress and the country information that they ought to have.

Mr. PAGE. I will say in answer to the gentleman who has just taken his seat, that it is in the power of the Committee of the Whole, by accepting the amendment I have offered, to make this appropriation in such a way that the money shall be expended, as it always has been expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ATKINS. I will ask the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] whether the Director of the Mint is not the proper person to have charge of this matter?

Mr. PAGE. The Director of the Mint may be a proper person to be Secretary of the Treasury or President of the United States. But I say that the provision for which gentlemen are contending here changes existing law, and in my judgment changes it in a way which cannot be beneficial. In my opinion all expenditures of money made by this bureau should be under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ATKINS. I was not speaking of the qualifications or abilities of the Director of the Mint. I was speaking of these duties which I say ought to belong to that officer. If the incumbent of the office is not a competent man, that is a matter of administration; he ought to be removed. But if he is a competent officer, then these duties ought to devolve upon him.

Mr. PAGE. I have no doubt that this money will be well expended by the Director of the Mint under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Why do gentlemen seek to take away from the Secretary of the Treasury the authority belonging to him under existing law and to transfer it to some bureau officer of the Government?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I have one additional point to which I desire the attention of the Chair. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] made a point of order against this whole paragraph because it changed existing law. The Chair sustained the point of order. What is that existing law? It is in the very words of the amendment now offered by the gentleman from California. The point of order now made against that amendment cannot be well taken, because it is in the very language of the law which the gentleman from California claimed would be changed by the original paragraph in the bill.

Mr. BAKER. The real point of order is this, that the gentleman from California now proposes to increase the public expenditure to the amount of $5,000 for an object not authorized by law; that is to say, there is no Department of the Government which by the terms of any law, general or special, is charged with the continuous duty of collecting and of preparing these statistics.
